Visitors to the forthcoming Birmingham Musical Festival will be astounded at the announcement—which, by the bye, does not figure in the detailed programmes already issued—that Palestrina's "Stabat Mater dolorosa" will be performed in accordance with an "arrangement" of the same prepared by Richard Wagner. What had this "great iconoclast" in common with the immortal Palestrina? some will doubtless ask. That Wagner was not the iconoclast that his earlier critics asserted him to be has been made fully apparent to readers of his literary works by the many eulogistic remarks, scattered throughout them, on the classical masters, especially Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, and notably, too, on Palestrina. None the less it seems well worth while, as briefly as possible, to examine into the circumstances which led Wagner to make a new version of this work of Palestrina's, and at the same time to institute a comparison between it and earlier editions.

In 1849, when Wagner occupied the post of Capellmeister to the King of Saxony, he drafted a plan for the organisation of a National Theatre, but which does not seem to have been published till it was incorporated under the title "Entwurf zur Organisation eines National Theaters für das Königreich Sachsen," in the second volume of his "Collected Writings" issued in 1871. As Court Capellmeister it was his duty not only to overlook the music of the Court Theatre, but also that of the Court Church. He had, therefore, a good deal to say in regard to the necessary reformation of the music in the latter, and, being of the opinion that a capella—i.e., unaccompanied vocal music—constitutes the only true style of Catholic Church music, he advocated the admission of women into the choir and the abolition of the orchestra, the introduction of which into her churches, he affirmed, led to the decadence of church music in Italy. It was at this period, by way of proving the superiority of unaccompanied music for divine use, that he prepared a modernised version of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater dolorosa"; but that it was at once put to the test does not appear. It is far more probable that the revolution in May of the same year put an end to all thought of reform either in Church or Theatre, and that its publication belongs to a later date.

In making this modernised version of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater dolorosa" it is, of course, impossible to say what edition Wagner had before him. A comparison of his version with that contained in Vol. VI. of Alfieri's "Raccolta di Musica Sacra," published at Rome in 1845, shows that he carried out the task he had set himself in a thoroughly reverential spirit. With the exception of one or two obvious corrections and the interpolation of accidentals (within brackets), he has preserved the musical text intact. The barring remains the same as that given by Alfieri, but for the convenience of present-day singers Wagner has substituted the clefs now in general use for those of an earlier date, and has adopted the minim instead of the semibreve as the unit of time; and this latter plan he has extended to that portion of the work in triple-time (Eia mater fons amoris) where the minim is now made to do duty for Alfieri's breve; the seeming anomaly being cancelled by the interpolated direction Largo, ma non troppo. He has furnished directions for phrasing, even to marking the breathing points, and has added dynamic marks of expression. By way of ensuring a greater variety of tone he has assigned certain portions of the work, originally designed for two choirs, to be sung by soloists. We therefore meet with such directions as the following: "Soli," "Full Chorus without Soli," "Soli and Semi-Chorus," "Semi-Chorus without Soli," &c. In one three-part passage, with the object of attaining a uniform timbre, he has transferred the tenor part to the alto, with the direction "Women's voices only."

It will be seen from the above that Wagner, without doing violence to Palestrina's score, has restricted himself to putting down on paper what every intelligent and conscientious conductor, who has had experience of the traditional mode of rendering Palestrina's music as it obtains at Rome and Regensburg, would have to do at rehearsal by word of mouth and gesture, in order to secure a proper rendering and the necessary unanimity of expression in performance. As unquestionably the admission of this fine work of Palestrina's in the programme of a Birmingham Festival is indirectly due to Wagner, we should proportionately feel grateful to him, as well as to his disciple, Dr. Hans Richter, for bringing it to a hearing.

Mr. (or Miss) R. Y. Sturges, author of "The Angel of Love," holds that critics in general, and that "small, shallow, and conventionally prosaic tribe the flute despisers" in particular, would do well if they imported into their writings a little more enthusiasm and poetic feeling for what is surely a poetic art. He has been moved to offer these remarks, which appeared in the Birmingham Daily Gazette recently, by the notices which have been printed in certain Chinese and Japanese papers of the performances on the flute by Herr Terschak. We make no excuse for transcribing the following interesting passages from the notices in question: "The opening piece was grand—myriads of heavenly horses trampling through the ethereal regions—and was followed by a piece like unto a gentle April shower, with its beautiful and soothing sprinkle and rapid spattering of the rainfall. One piece on the piano was something sublime; the highest pitch was similar to thousands of spirits moving and breathing in a mountain cave. There was one piece as if an army was in the highest pitch of fight in a battle, one could almost hear the clinking lances and the rumbling of the earth, caused by the moving feet of men. We even find music in the sand; there was one piece played as if the sand was shifting away by the mountain side and a flock of quails playing thereby. Most beautiful of all in my opinion was what resembled the singing and twittering of myriads of birds filling the heavens and proclaiming their joy at the forthcoming spring."

The Japanese musical critic is not behind his Celestial colleague in the picturesqueness of his phraseology. "It not infrequently happens," he observes, "that impressive parts of performances of this kind are made still more telling by something quite casual. Such was the case when Professor Terschak was rendering the 'Chant du Démon' in his most impressive manner. The heavens clouded over, and the interior (of what is known as 'The hall of the thousand grasses') grew dark, and just as the professor had reached the most weird part of the chant the darkness grew deeper and the wind came whistling into the building, and blew the artist's hair to and fro, thus adding intensity to the impressive aspect which, under the excitement of his performance, his giant form assumed. And when he came to those strangely loud notes, the sound of which has alarmed so many in the course of the professor's travels, the low moaning of the wind was heard throughout the building as though nature were in sympathy with art." We have certainly no writers among us, not even the word-painter of the Pall Mall Gazette, who can be mentioned in the same breath with the authors of the above excerpts.

A valued correspondent fears that the statement (contained in our brief review of Dr. J. F. Bridge's Christmas canticle "The Cradle of Christ") that the "hymn 'Stabat Mater speciosa' has been generally neglected, and that, therefore, Professor Bridge may be said to have had a free hand in setting it to music," may lead some to the belief that the "Stabat Mater speciosa"—unlike its companion hymn, "Stabat Mater dolorosa—has never been previously set to music. He therefore desires to call attention particularly to "the superlatively beautiful, simple, and homophonic choral setting" of both these sequences contained in Liszt's unduly neglected oratorio "Christus," from which two orchestral movements—viz., "The singing of the shepherds at the manger," and the "March of the three holy kings," brought forward by the late Walter Bache and by Dr. Hans Richter in 1885—seem to be the only excerpts from this fine work which have been heard in England. He adds that though "Christus," as it was undoubtedly intended to be, is better adapted for performance in church than in the concert-room, it contains several movements—notably the two sequences already alluded to, and the "Beatitudes," published in a separate form before they were incorporated into the oratorio—which are well worthy of the attention of choral societies and concert-givers.

A voice from Plymouth calls attention to the fact that this seaport can boast the highest percentage of successful candidates at the examinations of the Associated Board. According to a locally compiled table, Plymouth, in this particular, is seven times more musical than Manchester, fourteen times more than Liverpool, twenty-one times more than London, and twenty-four times more than Birmingham. The deduction, however, that therefore parents will find the best musical education for their children in Plymouth scarcely follows, although it redounds to the local patriotism of the writer. Still the success of the Plymouth candidates indicates a healthy state of music in the home that other towns might copy with advantage. The two most important acquirements for an examination are thorough knowledge of the elements of the subject and—a good coach; and these points are apparently fully realised at Plymouth.

The musical amateur in London has assuredly no possible cause for complaint in the prospect of the coming season; indeed, there is an embarras de richesses represented in the announcements made in another part of our present issue, which may well make the musical epicure hesitate in his choice from the menu set before him. Every kind of taste is provided for—oratorios, orchestral works, chamber music, ballads, pianoforte and song recitals, and even dramatic recitals with sauce musicale, are offered for his selection. The reproach can no longer justly be made that London is neglectful of oratorio, since there will be during the season no less than five performances of "The Messiah," four of "Elijah," three of the "Creation," two of "The Redemption," and two of "The Golden Legend," besides single performances of many other works. Here we have at last a formidable opposition of legitimate art to the less worthy attractions of the music hall.

Dr. Richter's forthcoming provincial tour is naturally anticipated with considerable interest, as our country cousins do not often have the opportunity of hearing orchestral music performed on so large a scale. The last Concert will be given at Brighton, in the Dome, on the 22nd inst. It is just eight years since Dr. Richter's orchestra was heard in Brighton; and with a view of stimulating public interest in the matter, a Brighton firm of musicsellers, Messrs. Chester, have printed a little pamphlet describing briefly and instructively the various pieces of the programme, and are distributing this gratis. Other towns, please copy.

BALLADS.

John Stuart Mill was once, they say,
Excessively dejected,
Because he thought that, in the way
That notes can be collected,
Arranged, disposed, there would at last
Be no more notes to shuffle.
How strange this fancy such a vast Philosopher should ruffle!

But it is proved, beyond a doubt,
That all the variations
Could never yet have been worked out,
If endless generations,
Instead of other play or work,
Had mingled music's mazes;
Unused, untried, there still would lurk
Innumerable phrases.

Nay more, a recent writer shows,
Had they mixed notes, like salads,
To suit the human mouth, he knows
They'd still be writing ballads.
Imagine, reader, if you can,
This painful proposition,—
Primeval, prehistoric man
Engaged in composition.

How could he write sad, dulcet strains,
To suit the lovesick sighing
Of some primeval poet's pains,
With passion's pangs complying,
When any time, without a hint
Of danger, some opposing Composer's cleaving axe of flint
Might settle his composing?

Just think of ballad-writing Greeks—
One Hymn to their Apollo
Has agitated us for weeks!
Then Roman ballads follow,
With medieval ballads, still Continuing for ages!
A list of recent songs would fill
This publication's pages.

So, if you are not over-fond Of ballads, now so many,
"We'd rather Man," you may respond,
"Had never written any."
Then do not be, like Stuart Mill,
With melancholy smitten,
Thank goodness that some ballads still Remain unsung, unwritten!

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

When a man who criticises others resents criticism of himself he is a spectacle for the gods to laugh at. Never, in that fashion, do I excite the risible faculties of Olympians. It is my duty and pleasure to take from criticism all that may profit me and forget the rest. Nor am I much concerned when my critics, in default of a better missile, cast mud. There is a proverb to the effect that if enough mud be thrown some of it is sure to stick. Whatever sticks to me I carry about as an indictment against the thrower. It does not injure me; it accuses him. "The song is to the singer," says Walt Whitman, "and mostly comes back to him." In like manner the libel is to the libeller and mostly comes back to him. But one thing I will not bear in silence. I will not be punished for the sins of others. When, therefore, the critic of the New York Evening Post (the Musical Courier says his name is Finck) assumes me to be the writer of an anonymous review of the London season which appeared in this journal last month, and forthwith accuses me by name of ignorance, stupidity, and prejudice, I enter a protest. I am not the author of that review. Whether the critic of the Evening Post will apologise to me for a gratuitous insult I do not know, but I hope that he is sufficiently informed as to the observances of decent society in such a case.

Another American paper, Freund's Musical Weekly, has credited me with the authorship of the review assailed by the Evening Post. In this case, however, there was simply quotation and no abuse, gratuitous or other. Really, gentlemen editors on the "other side," I must ask of your charity not to assume that every article which appears in The Musical Times is written by me. That is not the case, I do assure you. I have colleagues, who sometimes express opinions to which, while respecting them highly as those of honest and able men, I could not possibly subscribe. In the case of anonymous articles, gentlemen assail the editor. He is responsible, according to the etiquette of our common profession, and, as a man of cheerful temperament, he will not be hurt.

The Ulverston and Barrow News is one of the numerous journals which now provide their readers with regular doses of fiction. At present it is running a tale called "The Prophecy, or a Bride but not a Wife," written by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth. My attention has been called to a little scene in this story. A certain minister is entertaining some friends, and in the course of the evening rain sets in. Whereupon the host speaks: "Miss Wynne, hearken to that rain! No living creature shall leave my roof to-night for any bourne whatever, except it be stout Peter, whom I shall send to the Manor-house to apprise your friends of your whereabouts." Not having read the story from its beginning, it is impossible to say in what part of our Queen's dominions the English speech of social life takes this form, but the hospitable preacher betters the sample in answering one or two objectors to the stay-all-night proposal: "Mr. Mostyn, I presume you heard the observation I addressed to Miss Wynne, and which is equally applicable to yourself and also to my brother Frank here. Likewise, I suppose you are sufficiently well acquainted with these mountains to know that it will be impossible for you to ascend to-night, or even to-morrow. Finally, I suppose that no urgent business calls you to Bleakton. Moreover, listen to that rain." From a man who talks thus one would incontinently fly, but the visitors remained.

Mrs. Southworth having got her characters into the minister's parlour proceeds to make them spend the evening. "Come, Miss Wynne," said the dreadful host, "we cannot let the opportunity of your presence this evening pass unimproved. I know you will favour us with one of Haydn's or Beethoven's grand anthems," whereupon he led the young lady to the chamber organ. Miss Wynne played "a slow and solemn prelude and then with her voice struck into the sublime strains of 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'" The voice, Mrs. Southworth tells us, was "a rich double contralto," whatever that may be, and the effect of the song is described in the true novelist's style. Enough here that "for the whole length of the piece she held her audience spell-bound in a celestial trance." Then two idiotic persons began to discuss the double contralto. "Her voice," said the first idiot, "is a made one, the effect of cultivation, not the gift of nature." "What," exclaimed the second idiot, "those magnificent tones that filled all the air, that filled our hearts with a charge of electricity, those rich, deep, thrilling, thunderous tones——" "Were," interrupted No. 1, "Constance's own creation. Her natural voice was a falsetto!"

With reference to the starvation wage paid to music teachers as the result of excessive and ever-growing competition, "Saddleworthian" writes:—"A lady sent her daughter to me wishing to know my terms for pianoforte lessons. I mentioned a sum under £1 for ten lessons. In due course of post I received a reply that the above amount was 'too heavy'; she could send the girl elsewhere, she said, and only have to pay sixpence a lesson"! My correspondent suggests the formation of a society for the prevention of cruelty to music teachers, but in this case the victims are preying upon each other. Nothing can be done till some authority fixes the rate of payment. Seeing the rapid strides now made by Collectivism—this is genteel for Socialism—we may not have long to wait.

The Indian Mirror, a paper described as "written by Baboos for Baboos," had a correspondent at the Handel Festival, who informed trusting readers that 20,000 persons went to "Harden Messiah"; also that Mr. Ben Davies "made a great step in advance in his Passun solo and 'How shall dash them'"; also that "'Mr. Bantley' surpassed all previous efforts and was perfection itself in 'The trumpet shall stand.'" Let not the Baboos triumph; our own printer's boy can do equally well.

Holidays must be my excuse for not taking notice earlier of some remarks made by Mr. Paul Milliet in the course of a lecture on "The theories and errors of the modern music poem." Mr. Milliet appears to have lashed out at the critics, but that was a matter of course, and may have been intended to flavour the feast with a spicy and acceptable condiment. I pass it by for matter more serious and infinitely more profitable. Mr. Milliet said: "Of the many erroneous ideas to which the modern music poem had given birth there were none more striking than those which affected the treatment of melody." Having pointed out how composers strove to shape themselves upon the theory of Gluck and the practice of Wagner, he went on to say that melody found in England a shelter from scientific combinations. "English composers preserved their sensitiveness to the simple beauty of melody. They put therein neither science nor system, but their heart. It was an old way, but there was never yet a better to stir the emotion of the listener. Why then was so much heard of methods of composition? . . . Why did not they (the critics) show the disastrous consequences which result from a composer fettering himself with a system foreign to his genius?" Mr. Milliet may be assured that some of them have done so. I myself have pressed the point again and again, urging that English composers should write as Englishmen, in the spirit of their country's art, and not as Germans, or Frenchmen, or Italians. But the foreign model is still the one we copy, and so, for any appearance of change at present visible, it will be to the end.

Proud possessors of "Strads" should keep their eyes open. Aluminium violins are being tried in America, and are said to yield a great volume of tone. A specimen was lately introduced at a meeting of "scientists," and played upon by a competent performer. "Some musicians declared that the quality was not as good as a wooden one for solo work, but that it would prove good in orchestral work. Others took the opposite side of the question entirely, while a few predicted that in a few years aluminium violins will be substituted for the wooden instruments."

The little Cotswold village of Amberley has been favoured by musical folk this season. Mr. Gibson, of the Popular Concert quartet, industriously "golfed" on the beautiful upland for six weeks; Mr. and Mrs. Louis Diehl were sheltered for a still longer time in the Woodchester valley; Mr. W. Henry Thomas has also been a visitor, and he, too, wielded the driver and the diblick. Mr. Alfred Watson, of the Standard, was to be seen exploring the neighbourhood on horseback, nor did the present writer fail again to court the invigorating hill breezes of his native county.

Looking through a book entitled "The Cheltenham Mail Bag, or Letters from Gloucestershire, by Peter Quince the Younger" (Simpkin and Marshall, 1826), I came upon a rhymed reference to Braham which may still impart a lesson:

> "With leg outstretched, and outstretched arm,
> Like wizard mumbling o'er a charm,
> Glittering with graces, Mister Braham
> Delights like gew-gaws to display 'em.
> But all these wonders rich and rare
> Their sweetness waste in desert air,
> Since one pathetic simple strain,
> One unadorned, pure melody
> More thrills, more charms than all the vain
> Conceits that foreign tastes supply."

The rhymer proceeds with advice to the great tenor of his day:

> "Despite fastidious phantasies,
> Braham, I'd own your power to please,
> If still, amid the tortuous chords,
> You'd but indulge us with the words;
> For I confess a stubborn heart,
> Cold to the flourishes of art,
> That never at the laboured strain
> Felt an emotion but of pain,
> And only beats with joy intense
> When sweet sounds echo thought and sense,
> And poesy and love bestow
> On music its divinest glow!
> Hence does the human voice acquire
> A charm beyond the trembling wire;
> And some will tell you, right or wrong,
> The words at least are half the song,
> When of her wedded verse bereft."

The Cheltonian muse then proceeds to quote Goethe in "Wilhelm Meister": "The instrument should accompany the voice, for tunes and melodies, without words and meaning, seem like butterflies which we could wish to catch and make our own; whereas song is like a blessed Genius that exalts us towards Heaven, and allures the better self in us to attend him."

I have received a copy of an address issued to the members of the Apollo Club, Chicago, by their conductor, Mr. Tomlins. It will be remembered that the relations between Mr. Tomlins and the Club committee were, not long ago, strained to breaking. The details are now published, and we learn that Mr. Tomlins became conductor in 1875, at a salary of 1,000 dollars. During the next eleven years the work doubled and quadrupled, but the remuneration rose no higher than 1,200 dollars. In 1886 Mr. Tomlins asked permission to give an annual concert, such as, in England, we should call a "benefit," but the committee preferred to increase the salary to 1,500 dollars. This arrangement continued till 1889, when the Club membership was raised from 200 to 500. As this involved much more work, the stipend was increased to 4,000 dollars, and so remained till a year ago, when the committee lowered it to 2,500, the rehearsals being at the same time reduced one-half. The result was, says Mr. Tomlins, that the Club made 2,000 dollars clear profit, and its efficiency suffered.

In view of the season following, Mr. Tomlins asked for a larger number of rehearsals and for the restoration of a part (1,000 dollars) of his old salary, provided the Club's receipts permitted. Upon this arose disagreement. It must be understood that Mr. Tomlins's salary was looked upon by the committee as a retaining fee, entitling them to the exclusive benefit of his services in Chicago as regards choral concerts. It is clear from the address that Mr. Tomlins resents this limitation and others to which he vaguely refers. He says: "I have chosen to do broader work. . . . I cannot put it from me, and I will not . . . and to count up to me my share in the work accomplished at so much money per rehearsal, as was done in committee the day I resigned, was as disrespectful as it would be to offer a minister of the church a salary based upon so much money per sermon." Mr. Tomlins's circular is dated June 20 last, since when news of an amicable arrangement has reached us.

In such a case, it is difficult for a distant looker-on to form an opinion, because there are generally underlying causes of discontent. It would appear, however, that a commercial spirit has largely inspired the dealings between committee and conductor. Of course, all such relations have a business side. The labourer must secure the hire of which he is worthy, and the committee must keep out of debt. But transactions within these limits should surely be carried on in a broad and generous spirit. The greater and nobler end is not gain, but the higher good of art. Where that is studied, committees gladly lay out all the money they can spare upon efficient service, and conductors as gladly refrain from pressing claims which, if conceded, would result in starving other necessary agencies. I have dwelt upon this matter at such length because it conveys a moral adapted to do good on this side the great water.

Not having studied musical journals during the holidays, I do not know whether the notice of the profession in England has been directed to what is going on in the State of Alabama. From a letter in the Mobile Daily Herald I learn of a movement there which aims at controlling not only the musical education of the people in a general way, but also the individual teacher. It is proposed, for example, that "no one shall be allowed, under fines and penalties, to commence the practice of music in any county of Alabama where there is an authorised board of musical examiners until he (or she) has passed a satisfactory examination." Here is the policy, naked and not ashamed, which was advocated, a while since, by certain ardent spirits in England, and it will, therefore, be specially interesting to watch results. The writer of the letter aforesaid (a music teacher himself) protests with great energy, claiming, first, that the rights of the people will be ignored or outraged—which, perhaps, does not matter in the land of Mr. Justice Lynch. He urges, next, that the efficiency of the "protected class" would decline in the absence of competition, and, last, that other classes will demand like protection, with the result of an enslaved people. The news from Alabama seems likely to be interesting.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Again I have to record a successful meeting of the Three Choirs, and once more to state that the occasion was favoured by the splendid weather which, for so many years in succession, has attended these gatherings. Some may smile at the importance attached to the condition of the barometer. It is these who do not know how seriously attendance at our semi-rural festivals is affected by untoward climatic conditions. The business of the music meeting was laid out on the old Herefordian lines. As readers know, each of the three allied cities has to a certain extent its own procedure; the divergence, however, more concerns the religious proceedings than those which are more distinctly musical. The Hereford plan is to have a special service and sermon on the morning of the first day, and, in the matter of Concerts, to close on the evening of the fourth day with a chamber Concert in the Shire Hall. This rule was duly observed on the late occasion; the three choirs taking part in the service and the Dean preaching the sermon. The Very Reverend gentleman was a Canon of Worcester, it appears, when the Cathedral authorities began an unhappy attempt to reform the Festival from their point of view. He naturally made a reference to the fact, admitting that the attempt failed, but claiming, as he was justified in doing, that it brought about a more orderly and appropriate observance. This was the salient point of the Dean's sermon for many of us. As to the rest, the preacher asserted the high mission of music as an accessory to worship, and pleaded eloquently for the charity which the Festival has served so long and so well.

Turning to the musical performances, it would serve little purpose, and only tend to weary the reader, were I to go through the programme piece by piece, discussing the What, and When, and How. Much that is done on these occasions can be referred to in general terms, and readers can imagine how works like "Elijah" and "The Messiah" are given by a first-rate London orchestra, a chorus made up of picked voices from the three counties and Yorkshire, with such soloists as Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Santley. But while I need not spend time over these stock Oratorios, it is a duty to state that they drew the largest attendances, and the highest contributions to the charity. "Elijah" was heard by 1,646 persons, while 1,773 attended "The Messiah," the respective collections being £174 and £293. Other standard works in the programme were the "Last Judgment," the first part of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, Mendelssohn's Forty-second Psalm, the first two parts of the "Creation," and the "Hymn of Praise." As to these, general commendation of the performances will suffice, and I pass on to other things of less familiar interest.

A conspicuous and commendable feature in the scheme drawn up by the conductor, Mr. Sinclair, was the prominence given to works by native composers. The two novelties were both English: Dr. J. F. Bridge contributing a setting of Giacopone's "Stabat Mater Speciosa," and Dr. Harford Lloyd sending in a ballad, "Sir Ogie and the Lady Elsie." In addition were performed the second part of Dr. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem," and Dr. Parry's "Job. These four works were a sufficient and, most people will agree, an adequate representation of native talent. In the matter of comparatively new music from foreign pens, few could quarrel with the choice of Dvorák's Birmingham "Requiem," though many, prior to a really capital performance, may have doubted the prudence of selecting a composition which contains formidable difficulties. I was surprised to find a lack of public interest in the Bohemian master's music. The "Requiem" and the "Cradle of Christ," as Dr. Bridge's work is called, seemed to me strong attractions, but I judged from a point of view not occupied by the local public. At any rate, there was a small attendance, the numbers falling below a thousand. None the less should the performance of the "Requiem" be praised. It is true that the choir were helped through the frightful difficulties of the "Pie Jesu" by an organ accompaniment, contrary to the intention of the composer; but, notwithstanding such aid, the rendering of the piece was a distinctly meritorious achievement, reflecting credit upon everybody concerned, especially upon Mr. Sinclair, the Conductor, whose boldness was amply justified by his skill. Dr. Bridge's new work should meet with ready acceptance as Christmas music. It is both engaging and scholarly, while it appears to me, in some respects, the best and most hopeful composition as yet produced by the Gresham professor. There is in it less of restlessness—less of searching about for effects and greater assurance in treading a direct road to a clearly defined end. If I have judged aright, this is a very important matter for Dr. Bridge, who has got on the right track, and precisely the one most certain to lead him into public favour. The nature of his subject, in the present case, called for simple and refined treatment. That demand he amply met, particularly in the opening chorus and in the carol-chorus "Jesus lying in the Manger"—a peculiarly felicitous effort. Special mention should also be made of a soprano solo, "Jesus, Fount of Life still flowing," in which the figure of a flowing fountain suggests an elegant feature of accompaniment. Altogether the work has charm. What that means, with reference to its future, I need not tell.

The performance of the second part of "Bethlehem," no less meritorious than that of other works, served to justify the arrangement by which each division of the "Mystery" stands complete in itself. Instead of hearing the music set to the scenes in David's city under the conditions of a dissolving audience, it was listened to with attention fresh and unwearied, and had, therefore, every chance of making its mark. I may add that it had a first chance, remembering how the audience at the Albert Hall, whom the strains of seraphim would not keep in their seats to the end, began trooping out while yet the end was some way off. There was also, at Hereford, the manifest advantage of silent attention and the absence of anything to distract. Under these favourable circumstances, and with Madame Albani, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Watkin Mills as solo vocalists, amateurs could well estimate the value of Dr. Mackenzie's music. There is every reason to believe that nothing of its earnestness, high musicianship, and exalted purpose was lost, while it may easily be imagined that the numbers which, like the charming Cradle Song, made a simple and direct appeal to appreciation, not only convinced the minds, but touched the hearts of the audience. Madame Albani, in the music of the Blessed Mother, was a great success. She sang the part as no one else could, and may particularly be praised for an expression of fervour all the more effective because kept in just restraint.

Dr. Parry's "Job," which has now been heard at three successive Festivals, made its customary impression. The composer conducted, and again had the advantage of Mr. Plunket Greene's services as representative of the patriarch. Whatever may generally be said of this artist as an Oratorio singer, in "Job" he is without a rival. In his hands the long and famous "Lamentation" does not weary even those who are unable to appreciate its musical beauty and declamatory power. He makes in this a display of absolute excellence. The rendering of the work as a whole was satisfactory.

The attendance at the Cathedral performances, though not quite up to the mark of 1891, was not far below it, the figures being 8,670 as against 8,807. Note here that the number patronising the Festival in 1888 was only 6,635, and that the average in the period 1879-85 was but 6,357. Clearly, therefore, the aggregate in 1891 and 1894 represents a very large advance in public favour. The collections amounted to £798 14s. 6d., which, with certain supplementary amounts always paid direct to the treasurer, will probably make the Festival's contribution to the charity not less than £1,100.

There were two secular Concerts in the Shire Hall; one on Tuesday evening, when Dr. Lloyd's ballad was performed, in company with a Wagnerian selection; the other, on Friday evening, being confined to chamber music. The Eton precentor has treated a gruesome theme, akin to that of the "Spectre's Bride," with a good deal of cleverness, in no case departing from requisite simplicity and directness, and always presenting themes having more or less affinity to the typical ballad strain. The whole is musically interesting and claims for the composer no small credit. Choral bodies with a liking for ghost stories will find themselves suited in this piece, and even those who laugh at the Psychical Society may listen with interest and admiration. In conclusion, I must congratulate Mr. Sinclair upon a success personal to himself, and upon his proved ability to sustain and strengthen the repute of the Hereford Festivals.

THE BIRMINGHAM NOVELTIES.

I. Henschel's "Stabat Mater."

There is no mistaking the end which Mr. Henschel had in view when setting Giacopone's touching Hymn to music. He might have designed it as, primarily, a piece for the concert-room—one, that is to say, in which the words, and the worship of which they form a part, are subordinate to a display of musical skill. But the composer here gives us a genuine work for the church. One can hardly look through its pages without seeing a vision of gorgeous shrines, resplendent robes, and "windows richly dight." There is about it an odour of incense. All this derives strength from the fact that the music savours much more of the Latin peoples than of the Teutonic. It belongs to the sensuous school of Verdi and Gounod (though only in the most general way suggesting either of these masters) rather than to the colder, more abstract, and more intellectual creations of the rival race. Mr. Henschel, it seems to me, made a good choice, quite apart from the consideration that he consulted his own feelings. As a result, at any rate, Roman Catholic worship now possesses a new "Stabat Mater" instinct with its own spirit and feeling.

The work contains eight numbers, in all of which soli are combined with the chorus, and both with an orchestra that must, for these days, be regarded as unusually reticent. That Mr. Henschel knows how to employ all the means at his disposal, and can pile Pelion upon Ossa with the rest, sufficiently appears in the "Inflammatus," where everything, from piccolo to tamtam, comes into play. But, for the most part, he is sparing of noise, preferring much more to trust in the delicate effects secured by consulting the individuality of the instruments and bringing it into prominence. It need scarcely be added that recurring themes are not employed, save in a solitary case, where a melodic figure, conspicuous in the first number, re-appears at the end. Let us glance at the numbers in their order.

the reiteration of which by the bass instruments is fertile in suggestion. In the orchestral introduction it is twelve times repeated. The work contains no similar device. Generally speaking, this opening number is distinguished rather by propriety of expression than by any salient features other than that already indicated. There is a middle episode, "Cujus animam," with a phrase in imitation for the solo voices; elsewhere the composer happily expresses the pathos of the situation through rich and moving harmonies, with occasional melody that appeals very strongly to emotion. The most original section is the Coda, in which the soli and chorus alternately recite fragments of the text on the dominant, while the orchestra reiterates the "figure" shown above.

"Quis est homo" is set as a tenor solo and chorus in G minor (Andante sostenuto). If not the most striking number, it is noticeable for well-sustained melody and the easy flow of its harmonies. The effect, helped by the generally low tone of the orchestration, is one of gentle melancholy.

"Pro peccatis" brings a change; the composer now having occasion to draw more largely upon his resources. The number, in F minor (Andante), employs a quartet of solo voices as well as the full chorus. The music of the leading section, which regards the Divine Figure on the Cross as suffering for human sin, is intense and, at moments, very impassioned. On the words "Et flagellis," for example, comes a veritable cry of pain from the female voices, followed by "Et flagellis subditum" from the full chorus in tones which seem to suggest the deepest humiliation. The middle section, "Vidit suum dulcem natum," offers a striking contrast, with its flowing and gentle strains in the relative major. There is here the charm of absolute beauty; but very soon a change to desolation not less complete takes place, and the setting of "Morientum desolatum, Dum emisit spiritum," with its unison ejaculations and solemn trombone harmonies, can only be described as a bit of excellent and impressive work.

Turning to the "Eia, Mater" (alto solo and chorus in F major, Andante), we are concerned with tender, devotional strains. The chorus here plays a subordinate part, doing little more than strengthen the harmonies accompanying the first section of the solo when that comes up for repetition by way of ending. It is, therefore, the solo around which interest gathers. This stands in two sections: one purely and quietly religious in feeling; the other, more ardent, and attended by independent orchestral passages that give welcome variety. The first phrase of the solo, by the way, is made very conspicuous—and, in the ensemble, becomes a theme for imitation; the solo voice answering a corno inglese.

It may well be that popular taste will derive most gratification from the "Fac me vere"—a duet in D major (Andante) for soprano and tenor, with an ensemble for soli and chorus by way of ending. Here the rhythm of 9-8 lends itself to a specially graceful and catching—I had almost said luscious—melody, sung first by the soprano, and echoed by the tenor, for the most part on a tonic pedal. A second section (G minor) is almost Rossinian in character, the voices flowing on in sixths. When the chorus (tenors and basses) enter, the leading theme appears in the tenor part, with independent phrases for soli. In the full chorus it is again heard from the sopranos. The charm of melody throughout the number is as perfect as need be, and there can arise no question as to the pleasure it will give.

The "Virgo, virginum præclara" (Adagio non troppo, G major), written for solo quartet and chorus, chiefly depends upon its harmonic and orchestral effects. The quartet begins with homophonic passages of the simplest character, having no instrumental support save a tonic pedal, sustained by the violoncelli, with detached notes on the fourth beat of each bar, struck by drums and double basses. Some part of this music is repeated by the chorus, the full orchestra accompanying, and the strings giving a unison counterpoint of continuous quavers. The contrast of force and colour is peculiarly effective. In the usual middle episode, the quartet deals with a short phrase in imitation, passing from it to a richly harmonised crescendo of considerable intensity. The first section comes back in due course, but is now an ensemble for quartet and chorus, with a deeply solemn and touching ending.

In the "Inflammatus" we find a further example of contrast, the middle episode, "Fac me cruce custodire," being as plaintive and entreating as the opening section is intensely, and, in a certain sense, violently descriptive of terror and dismay. Large means are used, a piccolo, tam-tam, and solo violin being added to the full orchestra, which now assumes an independent rôle, with trumpet calls and tempestuous passages for the bass instruments. These passages, by the way, are a rare feature in treatment of the special subject against which Mr. Henschel here measures his strength. Other features are more or less familiar, but the general effect is undoubtedly impressive. I cannot recall a more thrilling setting of the words "In die judicii"; voices (trumpets doubling) brokenly uttering the line in unison, to the slow, solemn, and subdued harmonies of trombones and tuba. It is in the episode already mentioned that the composer introduces a solo violin, which (the first clarinet doubling an octave lower) has an eloquent independent theme when the subject comes up for repetition by the chorus after statement by the quartet. The general style of the work does not favour contrapuntal features, but here we find a canon in the major ninth above for bass and soprano. As to the rest, the episode is purely devotional and set off by much thematic and harmonic beauty. The strenuous first section returns in an abbreviated form and has a Coda upon the thundering climax of which breaks, from trumpets and trombones, the first phrase of the old "Dies Iræ" melody. Twelve bars of orchestral Vivace, agitated and terror-stricken, end the number. Through them is heard the roar of the tamtam.

We now reach the final number, "Quando corpus," an Adagio in E flat for soli and chorus. This also is somewhat elaborate, and, like most of the other movements, careful to offer contrasted effects, here plainly suggested by the terrors of death and the glories of heaven. A full orchestra is employed, with harp and organ, which instruments are now introduced for the first time, of course in connection with the Paradise music. The opening section, "Quando corpus" has an effect of gloom and terror; the chorus (six parts) ejaculating the words at intervals, while the effect of a lugubrious theme for trombones is heightened by a roll (with kettledrum sticks) upon the bass drum. A fine crescendo on the line "Fac, ut animæ donetur" leads to the "Paradisi gloria," in which a broad phrase passes from one solo voice to another, accompanied by the harp, with broken chords for the strings. The change is highly effective, and the new subject-matter is developed, with ever-increasing force and glow of colour, to the end, where, on the "Amen," we hear the phrase with which the "Stabat Mater dolorosa" began.

From the foregoing outline sketch it is hoped that some idea may be formed of Mr. Henschel's interesting work.

II. Parry's "King Saul."

This extended and important Oratorio is in dramatic form, and contains four Acts; each sub-divided into scenes. The words are partly from the Bible, partly original, but in Biblical style, and partly in rhymed verse, the precedent of "Judith" being thus strictly followed. My first business is to take the reader along the line of the argument.

Act I., Scene 1.—The Israelites lament the state of oppression into which they have fallen, and demand a King. Samuel reproaches them, pointing out the consequences. They will not heed, and the Prophet thereupon announces that the leader they require will soon be with them. Scene 2.—Maidens are drawing water at a well, when Saul approaches, enquiring for Samuel. He is directed to the Prophet's abode, and there informed of his high destiny, and anointed King. A chorus of thanksgiving ends the Act.

Act II., Scene 1.—Samuel, in the name of the Lord, commands Saul to make an end of the Amalekites; the King calls his people to arms, and the host, with cries of "Glory to Saul," goes forth to battle. Scene 2.—The Evil Spirit tempts the King to disobedience by reminding him of the prizes of war and the wealth of ransom. Saul, listening, stops the slaughter. Then comes the dreaded Prophet, enquiring as to the sheep, oxen, and other spoil. Saul talks of offering these as a sacrifice, but Samuel at once pronounces his doom. Retribution is not far off. The Israelites are terrified at sight of Goliath and cry for help. Then follow the triumph of the King's destined successor; the songs of the people, who laud David more than Saul, and the suggestion of the Evil Spirit which gives the unhappy monarch over to the torments of envy.

Act III., Scene 1.—David and the people sing a Psalm of thanksgiving, following which comes a love duet for the young hero and Michal. Scene 2.—The Evil Spirit works upon Saul by taunting him with the defection of his own daughter. Michal thereupon warns David of danger and counsels flight. David expresses faith in the Lord, but goes, nevertheless; leaving Saul more angry than before and bent upon pursuit. Scene 3.—Saul and his men, weary with pursuing David, sleep in a cave, where a dream troubles the King. It is described how a terrible and mocking spirit came to taunt him with news that David had entered the cave while he lay helpless, and yet had spared his life. A voice suddenly cries "King Saul!" the soldiers awake and recognise David. Then follow the incidents with which everybody is familiar, ending with the departure of David to Ziklag. Michal appears, enquiring for her hero, and is told that he is in the Lord's hands.

Act IV., Scene 1.—The Evil Spirit having announced to Saul that his doom is near, a cry of war again is heard, the people demanding to be led against their ancient foes. But Saul trembles and is afraid, whereupon the Evil Spirit counsels a visit to the Witch of Endor, and departs, saying "My mission is accomplished." Scene 2.—This is taken up with the incidents at Endor, as they are narrated in the Bible. The Witch sees, as in a vision, and describes the death of the King. Scene 3.—Michal, David, and the People sing a Lament for Saul.

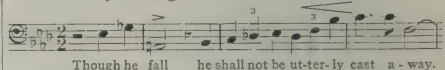
Who does not see that an excellent choice of picturesque and moving incidents has been made by the anonymous author and compiler of the "book"?

I am not writing an analysis, and shall scarcely be expected to deal with the music of this long work number by number. Remarks, more or less general, upon structure and character must for the present suffice. It will readily be assumed that the composer presents himself here as we have seen him in "Judith" and "Job," the latest work being marked by the same virility and directness; the same thoroughly English style; the same power of description and suggestion. I should say, also, the same skill in the rare art of so writing declamatory music as to strengthen, not enfeeble, the expression of the text. This Oratorio, however, shows Dr. Parry employing representative themes in a fuller and more decided manner than before. Moreover, he modifies them à la Wagner; so that, structurally, the method of the music approximates to a model which, while it has advantages, has also dangers. I cannot say that the Leitmotiv system is actually overdone in the present case, but it would appear that the composer has taken it as far as is consistent with safety. Saul has two themes, one representing him as a man, the other as a king. Another motive stands for David, another for the Evil Spirit, while others are associated with events and circumstances, such as the anointing of Saul, the love of David and Michal, &c., the arrangement being so complete that Dr. Parry is able, in an extended orchestral introduction, to present a musical epitome of the "argument." He starts with the motif of Saul as a man; presently we reach the Anointing theme; next that of the Evil Spirit, with a reference to the scene at Endor. Presently the David subject appears, and a suggestion of the Love scene, followed by Saul's personal theme, now in a minor key; and, lastly, by a passage from the Lament. So, to those who know the motiven and can recognise them, the prelude foreshadows what is to come.

Although it may not be said that an Oratorio absolutely stands or falls by its choral writing, thereupon, no doubt, hang very important results. The choruses in "King Saul" indicate that Dr. Parry has been fully alive to this fact and taken measures accordingly. He strikes the right note, sonorous, unmistakable, in the opening complaint of the distracted people. All is bold and effective, with no network of tortuous harmonies to confuse the issue by bewildering the ear. A more graceful result is achieved in a three-part chorus of Maidens at the well, which suggests the charming sacrificial music in "Judith." (This piece in praise of water will go the round of Temperance fêtes.) In the final and thankful chorus of Act I. the composer puts forth his full strength. It is a chorus of the good old-fashioned sort—such an one as Mendelssohn would have written under the same circumstances, with enough of counterpoint for variety, and plenty of broad, massive effects. In the same vein is a chorus of anticipated victory over the Amalekites, beginning with a passage for all the male voices—

Another great effort is made at the end of Act II., when the people, after the death of Goliath, acclaim David and Saul. In such a case it must be difficult to keep away from Handel, and here and there I note touches suggestive of the mighty Saxon, as, for example, in an orchestral unison—

This very important number is much varied, ranging from simple outbusts of exultation to quasi-dramatic passages such as that which depicts the downfall of the Philistine champion. Everywhere the master-hand is discoverable, going straight to the point by the shortest and most obvious route. In Act III. are many choral passages which belong to the dramatic action, but only one of large development. This is found at the end, where Michal is assured that her beloved is in the hand of the Lord. It fills fourteen pages of the pianoforte score, and is largely contrapuntal, dealing with various subjects treated in imitation, among them this very striking one—



There is no set form, the composer passing freely from text to text and from theme to theme, but throughout are the same boldness of outline and force of utterance in combination with high musicianship. The last act, like the third, reserves its choral strength for the close; the People there joining David and Michal in great lamentation over the dead King. Much might be said concerning the beauty and pathos of this Finale, but I must needs refrain.

The solo voices play a very important part throughout; Michal being soprano; the Evil Spirit, contralto; David, tenor; Saul, baritone; and Samuel, bass. As may be imagined, much of the work they have to do is declamatory, the lyrical portions being comparatively few. But Dr. Parry's declamation is always interesting, not only for the merit of just accent and emphasis already pointed out, but also on account of its purely musical qualities. Among the more lyrical solos, that sung by the then happy Saul on his way to Samuel, "The heavens are full of radiant light," deserves particular notice. The flush of youth and the joyousness of content find expression in every page. Different, though equally animated and energetic, is the King's summons to war against Amalek—a solo bright and stirring as a trumpet call. The solos of the Evil Spirit have a cachet of their own, and are distinguished by more elaborate devices in accompaniment than the others. Notable, also, is Michal's song of victory, "Arise and sing," with its delightful episode (one thinks of the Boy's song in "Job"), "The shepherd came up from the care of the sheep"; but still more popular will be the love duet, "The voice of my beloved," into which, within the limits applicable to a work of sacred character, the composer has put all the force and beauty of strongest human passion. Saul's song of revenge, "Fled is mine enemy," and Michal's love song, "Saw ye him whom my soul loved," are likewise worthy of mention. So are others, but enough that the solos are as much to the purpose as the choruses and quite as full of musical interest.

With regard to the orchestration nothing definite can be said, but in that department it is quite easy to trust the composer. With equal confidence do I anticipate for "King Saul" a success not less distinguished than that enjoyed by "Judith" and "Job."

III. Goring Thomas's "The Swan and the Skylark."

This is mainly a setting of Mrs. Hemans's well-known poem of the same name. For the rest, it deals with four stanzas introductory by an anonymous poet, who need not have concealed his name, and two interpolated stanzas by Keats and Shelley respectively; that from the first-named beginning "Adieu, adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades," while the Shelley lines, "Higher still and higher," &c., will instantly be recognised as part of the "Skylark." All the words, pathetic in themselves, become more touching by connection with the fact that the lamented composer was violently wrenched from life before he could complete his task. Remembering this, who can read the lines subjoined without emotion:—

But thou, sweet boon, too late
Poured on my parting breath, vain gift of song!
Why com'st thou thus, o'ermastering, rich and strong,
In the dark hour of fate?
Only to wake the sighs
Of echo-voices from their starry cell;
Only to say—O sunshine and blue skies!
O life and love! farewell.

The note of melancholy is struck in the opening verses of the anonymous writer, who imagines a Grecian poet born when, poetry and beauty gone, nothing remains but a "sullen world of stock and stone." The soliloquy of this character is set as a declamatory bass solo, divided by an orchestral movement from the beginning of the story as told by Mrs. Hemans. Most expressive and moving is all the music connected with the dying swan, which, to the listening poet, seems to chant a farewell to nature:—

Summer, I depart;
O light and laughing summer, fare thee well;
No song the less through thy rich woods will swell,
For one, one broken heart.

This is set as a tenor solo of much tenderness and beauty, having a final section in which the chorus joins. The verse by Keats, for alto solo and chorus, is saturated with melancholy, but melancholy that has the subtle charm of an autumn day, the loveliness of decay and death. Next follows the Skylark section, with its contrasted spirit of gladness. The extended chorus with which it begins is in the composer's most fascinating style, and worthily followed by a descriptive soprano solo, at the opening of which the voice emulates the roulades which the lark carries to the gates of heaven. The whole section is free and joyous, but, at the close, a solemn Andante asserts the wonder and mystery of Nature. Mournful, it suggests the great question to which no answer is ever given, and can only say: "Oh, thou art mighty, thou art wonderful, mysterious nature!" Throughout this work the special gifts of a most refined and delicate genius assert themselves conclusively, and will, in due time, demand full consideration. The cantata has been scored for orchestra by Dr. Stanford, who will conduct the Birmingham performance.

THE COMING SEASON.

That musical amateurs, artists, critics, and entrepreneurs generally in the metropolis are likely to have an exceptionally busy season there is every reason to anticipate. The announcements already made by Mr. Newman, at Queen's Hall; by the Royal Albert Hall, and other choral societies; regarding the Crystal Palace, and other orchestral Concerts; and in Mr. Basil Tree's useful "Panel date list," all "give busy note of preparation" for a feast of good things to come during the winter of 1894-5. First in magnitude we must note the doings of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. There will be eight Subscription Concerts, beginning November 12 and terminating on May 6; and the usual extra performances of "The Messiah" on New Year's Day and Good Friday. The series will include "Elijah," "Israel in Egypt," Berlioz's "Faust," "The Golden Legend," "The Spectre's Bride," "The Redemption," and the "Creation"; but the Concerts which will claim the special interest of amateurs will be those of February 7 and March 21, when the Birmingham novelties, Dr. Parry's Oratorio "King Saul" and Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater," will have their first metropolitan hearing. Other choral performances worthy of note are those of the Bach Choir on April 2, 4, and 6, when Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion, a Bach selection, and the B minor Mass, will constitute a Bach Festival; the Concerts of the newly established London Choral Union, which will give "Elijah," "St. Paul," "The Messiah," and "The Golden Legend"; of the Queen's Hall Choral Society, which will perform the "Creation," "The Messiah," "Elijah," "The Redemption," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Carter's "Placida"; and of the National Sunday League, whose series will include "The Messiah," "Creation," "Judas Maccabæus," "Elijah," "The Last Judgment," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," Parry's "Job," and other works. All these performances will be at Queen's Hall, the last-named on Sunday evenings—a significant innovation.

We have next to note the Orchestral Concerts, beginning, by right of seniority, with the Philharmonic Society, although these Concerts do not commence until the spring; there will be seven in all, the first, on March 7, and the last, on June 13. Next in order of importance come the London Symphony Concerts, at Queen's Hall, of which there will be nine, beginning on November 1 and concluding on March 14. The solo artists at present engaged by Mr. Daniel Mayer for these Concerts are the pianists M. Diémer, Mr. Emanuel Moor, Mr. Fred. Dawson, Madame Augarde, and Mdlle. Ilona Eibenschütz; (violinists), M. Rivarde and Mr. Sons; (violoncello), Herr Popper. Then follow the Richter Concerts, two of which will be given on the 8th and 15th inst. at St. James's Hall, and one at Queen's Hall on the 20th inst. (afternoon); the Wagner Concerts at Queen's Hall, on November 6, 20, and 27, the first to be conducted by the composer's son and the others by Herr Mottl; the Royal Artillery Band Concerts, on the afternoons of November 30 and December 14. Lastly, the Amateur Orchestral Societies claim attention: The Royal Amateur, on November 28, February 20, and May 2; the Strolling Players, on November 22, December 20, March 6, and May 9; and the Stock Exchange, on December 19, February 19, and April 29. All these Concerts, with the one exception named, will take place at Queen's Hall.

Last, but by no means of least importance, the prospectus of the thirty-ninth series of Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace calls for notice. The first Concert will take place on the 13th inst., and, as usual, the programmes of only the first ten Concerts are detailed. Herein we may note the performance, for the first time at these Concerts, of Dr. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture, a Te Deum for orchestra and organ, by Sgambati; Dvorák's "American" Symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," a Concert-Overture "In praise of Scottis Poesie," by W. Wallace; a Concerto for violin and orchestra, by Moszkowski; Pianoforte Concerto (No. 2), by E. D'Albert; Mr. German's Suite from the incidental music to the drama "The Tempter"; an Idyll for orchestra, by Stewart Macpherson; Goldmark's Overture "Sappho," and, at the final Concert on December 15, Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet" and the prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Saëns. The Concert of November 3 will be in memoriam of Mendelssohn and will consist entirely of that composer's works, and on the following Saturday Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" will be performed. Other novelties will be Mr. Sauret's Elégie et Rondo for violin played by the composer, and among the soloists may be observed Herr Lundquist from the Royal Opera at Stockholm, who will introduce a ballad, by A. Söderman, entitled "Tannhäuser," for baritone solo and orchestra. The other artists engaged are of the usual high standard and, needless to say, the general-in-chief will be Mr. Manns. After Christmas we are to have a Wagner Concert, a cantata, "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," by R. H. Walthew (performed some time since by the Highbury Philharmonic Society), and "Young Lochinvar," a ballad for chorus and orchestra, by A. Davidson Arnott.

The Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts (thirty-seventh season) commence respectively on the 29th inst. and November 3, and continue their weekly course, at St. James's Hall, until April 8, with an interregnum, from December 17 to January 12. The Thursday Subscription Concerts, of which there will be six, beginning on November 1 and terminating on March 21, will be given at the small Queen's Hall. Details of the Concerts were given in our last issue. Messrs. Boosey's Ballad Concerts will (with the exception of one on Ash Wednesday evening) be given on Saturday afternoons. Seventeen Concerts are announced at Queen's Hall, beginning November 24. At St. James's Hall Messrs. Chappell will inaugurate a series of seven evening and six afternoon Ballad Concerts, on November 21, under the title of the St. James's Hall Ballad Concerts. The management of these Concerts has been placed in the hands of Mr. William Boosey. The above exceptionally long list of announcements has yet to be supplemented by the Vocal and Pianoforte Recitals, to be given at St. James's Hall on Friday afternoons, November 16, December 14, and January 11, by Mr. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick — these Recitals were successfully inaugurated by a single Recital last season; by the Concerts of the Wolff Musical Union, the first of which will be given to-morrow evening at St. James's Hall; and by Pianoforte Recitals by Josef Hofmann at St. James's Hall on November 19, by Mr. Dal Young (a pupil of Leschetizky) at Queen's Hall on the 30th inst., and by Mdlle. Marie Dubois at the Salle Erard on the 13th and 20th inst.

Mr. Percy Notcutt and Mr. Ambrose Austin also announce Concerts at St. James's Hall on the 13th inst. and November 30 (St. Andrew's Day) respectively, and the Post Office Choral Society will give a performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," at Queen's Hall, on December 6.

AN ARTISTIC JUBILEE.

A Cathedral organist, if he be worthy of his position, must be classed as one of the most useful and influential members of the musical community. His life is generally, however, in spite of the variety afforded by occasional strife with his Precentor, uneventful, and it is all the more to his credit if he succeed, after a prolonged service, in retaining anything of his original ardour and youthful enthusiasm. The testimonial that is to be given to Dr. Garrett, the well-known Cambridge organist and church composer, in commemoration of half-a-century's continuous work in choir and organ loft, is one that is more than commonly well deserved. It is just fifty years since he entered the choir of New College, Oxford, as a lad of ten, and ever since then he has laboured without ceasing as a Church musician, whether at Winchester, under his master, Dr. Wesley, or for a brief season in the Cathedral of Madras, or again in his last and most important post as organist of St. John's College, Cambridge. Here his service has extended over the long period of thirty-seven years. Contact with youth should, it would seem, tend to preserve one's own youthfulness, but the typical college don proves this to be a false assumption. In Dr. Garrett's case, however, it would seem to have had this effect, for, whether his playing, his choirmastership, his compositions, or, it might be added, his conversation, be taken as a criterion, all alike belie the sixty years to which he must own—supposing the biographical dictionaries to be rightly informed in the matter of dates.

Apart from the necessarily monotonous character of his duties, the conditions under which a college organist labours are not in all respects the best calculated to stimulate, or even to conserve, his youthful energy and enthusiasm. Though, in the larger colleges, a musical service of the Cathedral type is aimed at, it frequently happens that the Dean is a person possessing little sympathy, and no knowledge, in things musical. Of the many generations of undergraduates who, more or less unwillingly, attend the chapel services, it is to be feared that a majority regard the musical part as an unnecessary and unwelcome prolongation of what is already long enough to well-nigh exhaust their small stock of patience. And, in the case of St. John's College, it can hardly be said that the general conduct of the services, quite apart from the music, is at all in keeping with the stateliness of the sumptuous chapel designed by Sir Gilbert Scott just thirty years ago. The musical part of the service, however, has never been allowed to fall below the high level to which Dr. Garrett succeeded in raising it, and it may still be held up as a model Anglican service of the Cathedral character. The pains taken in chanting the Psalms, greatly enhanced by the appropriate, yet reticent, organ accompaniment, is a feature in the service which organists and choirmasters would do well to copy. It shows what may be made out of a portion of the service too often slurred over, and those who have habitually taken part in the services at St. John's can never altogether lose the impression made upon them by the thoughtful and expressive manner in which the Psalms are sung—that is, supposing them to be susceptible to such impressions, which is not invariably the case, even with the callow undergraduate.

To the world at large Dr. Garrett is best known as a composer, rather than as an executive musician. "Garrett in D" and "Garrett in F" are just as widely known as the Anglican Church itself. And it is well that these, and others of their kind from the same pen, should be popular, for they typify what is best in contemporary Anglican service music. Dr. Garrett's success as a Church composer lies in this: he has hit the happy medium between the dryness of the older Anglican school, on the one hand, and French frivolity and Italian sensuousness on the other. He has retained the dignity of the first, and mingled with it the more attractive qualities of the other two. A recent writer has described Dr. Wesley's music as "a judicious combination of ancient and modern," and this description applies with almost equal force to the compositions of Wesley's most distinguished pupil. To the writer it has always seemed that in Dr. Garrett's music there was discernible the influence of Spohr, and, in a smaller degree, that of Gounod; while of Mendelssohn, by whom English composers have until recent years been so strongly influenced, there is little or no trace. But, whether this analysis be correct or not, there can be no doubt that the Cambridge musician has contrived, in his setting of the Church Services, to clothe the somewhat dry bones of Anglican music with something that makes it more pleasant, without any detriment to the reticence and dignity which the Church of England requires in her services.

A third and less conspicuous aspect of Dr. Garrett's career is his work as a teacher. Putting aside the many private pupils who have benefited by his instruction, his labours as University Lecturer on Harmony and Counterpoint, and as Examiner for the University, as well as for many other teaching institutions, are entitled to cordial recognition. Dr. Garrett is not one of those musicians who take their responsibilities easily. Few organists have owed less to deputies, and, whether as College organist or University organist—a post held by him since the death of Mr. J. L. Hopkins, some twenty years ago—Dr. Garrett has set an example of assiduous attention to his duties worthy of the sincere flattery of imitation. He has had his reward in the approval of those well qualified to judge, and it is pleasant to find that his admirers are not waiting to do him merely posthumous honour. Let us conclude with a practical reminder that subscriptions towards the testimonial may be paid to Mr. R. A. Macalister, Torrisdale, Cambridge.

PROFESSOR VON HELMHOLTZ.

Among the noteworthy occurrences of the past month has been the death of the illustrious physicist, Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand Helmholtz, which took place at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, on Saturday, the 8th ult., the cause of death being a fit of apoplexy, from which he never rallied or regained consciousness. His nearer relatives were round his death bed, and the Empress Frederick's regard for him was shown in her anxious inquiries about him. He was born August 31, 1821, at Potsdam, and had just entered upon his seventy-fourth year. His father was a professor in the Gymnasium; his mother, Caroline Penn, came of an English family. Belonging to the professional class, he was brought up a surgeon, and served in the Prussian army in that capacity. In 1848 he was appointed assistant in the Anatomical Museum at Berlin; and, in 1849, he was transferred to Königsberg, to be Professor of Physiology there. In 1856 he went to Bonn in a similar position, and in 1859 to Heidelberg. 1871 saw him Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Berlin—his last appointment. The Emperor William raised Helmholtz, in 1883, to the hereditary nobility. We have not to do here with those original and brilliant studies which made him famous in many branches of scientific research, especially optics. It is in acoustics and his relation to practical music, through the now universally known "Sensations of Tone as a physiological basis for the Theory of Music," that our readers best know him, and have, consequently, to deplore his loss. This great work first appeared in 1863, and has gone through four editions in Germany, the last appearing in 1877. There have been two English editions, the faithful work of the late Dr. A. J. Ellis, F.R.S., which appeared in 1875 and 1885 (Longmans, London). The latter of these comprises Helmholtz's revision of 1877, and is provided by the translator with appendices, bringing the great work up to date. When it first appeared its contents were strange to musical students, but thirty years have brought about a complete recognition of its merit and supreme value. In it the conspicuous literary talent of Helmholtz is admirably supported by a rare musical taste and an ethnological and historical knowledge which display the extraordinary versatility of this deep-thinking scholar and experimentalist. The plan and scope of the "Sensations of Tone" are now too well known to require to be discussed in this notice. His analysis of musical tones, and the employment of resonators to make the separate partial tones audible, are now common property; but less has been said about his remarkable discernment of those æsthetic principles which have in different eras and at different places determined the accepted forms of scale, mode, and style that have passed, and do pass current. He has laid down the principle that Art creates as Imagination pictures, without conscious aim, and the reverse; that a work produced as a work of mere intelligence will never, as such, be accepted as a work of art, however perfect may be its adaptation to its end. The summing up of the results of this investigation shows Helmholtz as a master of metaphysics as well as natural philosophy. So far the general positions laid down in this great work have been unassailed; but it was not even in Helmholtz's power to tap the secrets of all the musical instruments he used for illustrations; such spots are only technical, and leave the bright light unimpaired which has emanated from this extraordinarily gifted mind.

REVIEWS.

Octavo Anthems. Nos. 447-464.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This series of Church compositions increases so rapidly that it is difficult to keep pace with the succession of fresh numbers. The first three in the present instalment are Christmas anthems, and it is scarcely too soon to regard them as seasonable for preparation, at any rate, by amateur parish choirs. The first is "There were Shepherds," for soprano solo and chorus, by Herbert W. Wareing. After some effective passages, both in recitative and rhythmical melody for the principal voice, there is a somewhat extended but simply constructed chorus, the anthem concluding with "Hark, the herald angels sing," of course wedded to Mendelssohn's matchless tune. "The first Christmas," by J. Barnby, is described as a carol anthem, and is in four choral sections, all strongly rhythmical in character, and combining quaint mannerisms with modern expressiveness. Another carol anthem is "Dawns the day," by Robin H. Legge. This is also in several sections, more or less hymn-like in character, and a treble solo voice is necessary, or, at any rate, desirable. A smoothly-written and church-like anthem for general use is No. 450, "Bless thou the Lord," for chorus and treble or tenor solo, by Clowes Bayley. No. 451, "Saviour, abide with us," by T. W. Hanforth, is for evening service; it is for treble solo, quartet, and chorus, and is at once tuneful, easy, and devotional. Very different in character is "The Story of the Cross," by J. Stainer. This is of course for Passiontide, and is a deeply expressive setting of the Rev. E. Munro's verses, with brief interludes, giving opportunity for meditation. No. 453, "If ye love Me," by Herbert W. Wareing, is for Whitsuntide. It is full throughout, and without contrapuntal elaboration, but by no means monotonous, some of the harmonic progressions towards the close being very effective. The title of the next, "Christ is risen," by G. B. J. Aitken, is sufficient to indicate that it is for Easter. Two studiously simple choruses are separated by a brief treble solo, the tone of the whole being devotional rather than triumphant. Nos. 455, "Jesus Christ is risen to-day," by Oliver King, and 456, "At the Sepulchre," by Herbert W. Wareing, are also for Easter. Though full throughout, the voice parts in the first are freely treated, and the style for the most part is modern. There is more than a suggestion of the old-fashioned but still popular Easter Hymn. Mr. Wareing's anthem is for bass solo, quartet, and chorus, and is, in general, vigorous, but without any special distinguishing characteristics. No. 457 is another setting of "The Story of the Cross," by Myles B. Foster, very similar in structure and phraseology to that of Sir John Stainer mentioned above. Then we revert once more to Easter; a short anthem, "Thanks be to God," by John W. Gritton, being very bright, melodious, and unassuming. A few bars are written for treble and tenor solo voices. No. 459, "Lord of our life," by J. T. Field, is a pleasing and quiet little anthem for any season, with a brief solo for either soprano or tenor. Three more Easter anthems follow. The first is "My heart was glad," by Arthur Carnall, very placid and almost suitable for Lent; the next, "The Day of Resurrection," by the Rev. E. V. Hall, for tenor solo and chorus, is more jubilant, but quite easy; and the third, "This is the day," by Arthur W. Marchant, is also, for the most part, spirited, with an intermediate section of a quieter nature. No solo voices are necessary. No. 463, "While the earth remaineth," by C. Lee Williams, is for harvest-tide, and consists of a solidly written chorus, followed by a section for solo voices, after which the chorus is repeated. The last of the series for the present is Sir John Stainer's beautiful arrangement of the Miserere, which is always found so impressive in St. Paul's Cathedral at special Lenten Services.

The Parish Choir Book. Nos. 143 to 154.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This highly esteemed publication grows apace, and the numbers now to be noticed only constitute a portion of those we have on our table. The first is a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, by C. H. Lloyd, a somewhat elaborate and certainly very effective setting of the evening Canticles, composed for the Festival of the Salisbury Diocesan Choral Association in the present year. Portions are written for voices in eight parts, and the whole is vigorous and modern in feeling. No. 145 is a Te Deum in A, by Arthur Henry Brown, unpretentious but spirited, and meritorious in respect of the attention paid to the correct accentuation of the words, a matter in which many church composers of talent display much laxity. The same composer's Benedictus, also in A, has similar characteristics and forms a worthy companion to the Te Deum. The next two numbers are settings, in chant form, of the Te Deum and the Jubilate, by A. W. Hamilton-Gell, both very simple, and written in plain four-part harmony. They would be equally effective if sung in unison with appropriate organ accompaniment. In No. 149 we have the simplest possible setting of the twenty Offertory Sentences, by Henry Knight, each section consisting of about twenty bars of music, devotional and hymn-like in character. Mr. Hamilton Clarke's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F is bright and spirited, but not elaborate, no solo voices being required, though the adoption of the time-honoured antiphonal Decani and Cantoris singing would certainly be desirable, as indicated. No. 151, a Te Deum in C, by P. C. Lutkin, is a setting that shows remarkable promise. The composer's name is not yet familiar, but it will be if he continues to write church music so fresh and so musicianly as this setting of the Ambrosian Hymn. Solo voices are required and the Te Deum is eminently adapted for festival use. No. 152, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in chant form, by Sir John Stainer, only needs its composer's name to recommend it; but it is astonishing how much freshness this accomplished musician has infused into his music, which of course is designedly of the simplest character. Those who like chant settings of the Canticles will like this example. Another version of the same Canticle, in E flat, by Stewart

Macpherson, forms the next number. This is more in the traditional style of English church music, though there are phrases which have a distinctly modern flavour, and the pianissimo close is charming. The last for the present consists of a Benedictus and Kyrie Eleison, by Stewart Macpherson. The former presents similar characteristics to the Te Deum noticed above by the same composer, and the latter is smooth, flowing, and devotional.

Hispania Schola Musica Sacra. Edited by Philippo Pedrell. Vol. I. [Barcelona: J. B. Pujol and Co.]

This is the first instalment of a collection which is rightly described by its publishers as "monumental." Its object is to make more widely known the sacred music composed by Spanish masters during the fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. It is proposed to include works by Peñalosa, Rivera, F. Cevallos, Torrentes, Morales, Escobedo, P. Fernandez, Bernal, M. Robledo, Guerrero, Victoria, J. G. Perez, Navarro, Cómes, D. Perez, D. Ortiz, Lerisa, Periañez, Aguilera, Tafalla, Torres, Valls, and others, whose names are little known outside the peninsula, and with whose music probably even Spaniards themselves are not over-familiar. Each volume—it is proposed that three shall be issued each year—will contain, in addition to the music, a biography of each composer and critical notes on the works, in the French and Spanish languages. It is claimed, in a general preface by which the editor describes the plan of the work generally, that in the fifteenth century not only was musical science quite as advanced in Spain as in other countries, but, as regards expression and faithful adherence to the spirit of the text, the music of Spain excelled that of all other European nations. It is impossible to test this claim by the contents of the present volume, however, for they consist of compositions by Christophorus Morales, who was a contemporary of Josquin des Près, Willaert, Lasso, Festa, Clemens non Papa, and our own Christopher Tye. They include Motets, Responsoria, settings of the Magnificat, the Office for the Dead, &c., in four, five, and six parts. Much of the music is in the polyphonic style—not unlike Palestrina's, for instance, though less intricate—but in many passages the voices unite to form chords in full harmony, producing effects remarkable rather for richness than for melodic interest. The volume contains fifty-five pages of music and thirty pages of letterpress, is of folio size, and is admirably printed.

The Regent Edition of Ancient and Modern Classics. Edited and revised by Frederick Corder.

Popular Teaching Pieces. By Tobias A. Matthay. [Forsyth Brothers.]

The fourth series of the first-named excellent edition is now before us. It includes Hummel's Rondo in B minor (Op. 109), Mozart's Sonata in E flat, Steibelt's Study in C (Op. 78, No. 14), Schumann's Fugue in A (Op. 68, No. 40), and Dussek's "La Matinée" Rondo in D. These bring the publication up to the forty-second number, which in itself is a satisfactory witness of its acceptableness to teachers. It is to be regretted that the old English fingering has not been adopted, in accordance with modern German practice; but the explanatory and warning footnotes of the editor, who evidently believes that prevention is better than cure, are of inestimable value to the student and will prove a great assistance to his instructor.

Mr. Matthay has annotated his "Teaching Pieces" in a similar manner to Mr. Corder's series, and given a number of useful hints and indications concerning the proper method of performance. Mr. Matthay's pieces have the advantage, however, of the old English fingering and a helpful system of finger-groupings, the latter being admirably calculated to induce appropriate rhythmic accent. Nos. 3 to 6 respectively consist of Hummel's Rondo in B flat (Op. 107), Domenico Scarlatti's "Tempo di Ballo," a "Concert-Sonata" in A by the same composer, and the Adagio movement from Dussek's "L'Invocation" Sonata. That these should be termed by the publishers popular teaching pieces may be taken as a satisfactory indication of the kind of instruction now given by the majority of teachers.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Second Series. Nos. 710-726. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The high number to which this publication has attained bears witness to the strong demand now existing for part-music for mixed voices. A few words describing each of the present series will suffice. No. 710, "The merry month," by T. Rogers, begins in the liveliest fashion but ends dolefully. The composer writes agreeably, and should try his hand on a more cheerful subject. Shakespeare's lines from "Twelfth Night," "O mistress mine," have been frequently set, and Professor Frederick Bridge has provided a new version by adding the words to one of Morley's "Consort Lessons" (1599), or, rather, taking the parts for treble viol and flute, all that now remain, the tenor and bass being presumably his own. The added harmonies are mostly those in common use in the latter portion of the Elizabethan epoch. No. 712, "The Shepherd's Choice," by Alexandra Thomson, is a setting of verses by the early seventeenth century poet, William Browne. It is at once lively, pretty, and easy, certain, that is, to please singers and listeners alike. Dr. Harford Lloyd could not fail to display his admirable musicianship even in a part-song, and his "Come, tuneful friends," is full of clever touches, each line of the words being appropriately illustrated after the manner of the old madrigalian writers, Wilbye and Weelkes. "Go, lovely Rose," by Arthur Berridge, won a prize offered by the Nonconformist Choir Union, and is pleasantly written, obviously for elementary singing classes. Nos. 716, "A Lament"; 717, "The Watchman"; 718, "The Starlings"; and 719, "Hunting Song," by Robin H. Legge, are very brief but fresh and delightful settings of breezy verses by Charles Kingsley; as each occupies no more than two or three minutes in performance the entire series might be sung in succession without any chance of wearying an audience. The next two are by Alexandra Thomson: "The Shepherd's Elegy" has words by William Browne, and "Holiday in Arcadia," by J. Shirley (1594-1666). The music of both is suitable, but the second is the more pleasing of the two. No. 722, "The Haven" (which forms the Extra Supplement to our present issue), is by Joseph Barnby, the name being a guarantee of excellence, and in this instance words and music are alike religious and hymn-like. No. 723, "The Harvest Feast," by Alfred R. Gaul, and No. 724, "The last load," by Hamilton Clarke, are of course suitable for harvest-tide, but may be sung at any time. Both are gay and inspiriting, especially the former with its Gounod-like close. No. 725 is Mendelssohn's Op. 71, No. 6, a "Nachtlied," for a single voice, not frequently sung. The transcription is cleverly effected, and the casual listener would not guess that the pretty little piece was not an original four-part song. The last of the present series is "O lovely May," by Edward German, a beautiful little piece with an effective pianoforte accompaniment, mostly in rapid but perfectly easy arpeggios.

To-night and To-morrow. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherley. Music by R. Leoncavallo.

Déclaration. Song. Words by A. Silvestre. Music by R. Leoncavallo.

Album of Six Songs. By L. Denza.

My Children's Garden. Six short sketches for the pianoforte. Composed by E. Cutler. [E. Ascherberg and Co.]

The first of the above is an impassioned love song suitable for a mezzo-soprano voice, and furnished with a florid accompaniment that heightens the significance of the words. It may be recommended to dramatic concert-singers. The subject of the second may be well guessed from its title. It is more simple in conception than the first-named, but expressively sung by a tenor voice would not be less effective. Signor Denza's Album will doubtless find many admirers. The songs are mostly suitable for use in the home. They are unpretentious, easy, and melodious, and the duet for a high and low voice, with which the volume closes, is graceful and pleasing. Mr. Cutler's sketches may be warmly recommended to all who have little fingers to train. They are admirably calculated to excite a child's imagination and interest—two important factors in the successful tuition of children.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

This Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times, December 11, 1893.

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

The principle of Pointing followed is that of the Cathedral Psalter, with slight modifications here and there, suggested by experience, in the treatment of individual verses. For the accents which are used in the Cathedral Psalter to indicate the beginning of the bar of duple time, which connects the free recitation with the metrical part of the chant, are substituted super-imposed musical notes, in accordance with the principle set forth in the Preface to the Cathedral Psalter, so as to indicate exactly, in every verse throughout the Psalter, the best method of dividing the bar into the component parts of a semibreve. Other means also have been adopted to ensure clearness and promote facility.

Prefixed to the new Psalter is a Scheme of Chants and some brief Notes on the History of the Psalter and the Characteristics of each Psalm.

THIRD EDITION (REVISED AND GREATLY ENLARGED).

Containing 600 Chants. Price 2s. 6d.; Cloth, 3s.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 211-222. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Only two months have elapsed since we noticed the most recent issues of this publication, but a dozen new numbers are now to hand. The first four are from the pen of Mr. Hamilton Clarke, whose melodious, and by no means too difficult, pieces are grateful alike to organists and listeners. We have in this series no fewer than seven compositions, forming together a grand Suite (Op. 341), but of course available as separate voluntaries. Their titles are Prelude, Allemande, Elegy, Gavotte, Intermezzo, Minuet, and Introduction and Fughetta. The quieter movements, such as the Intermezzo and the Minuet, are graceful, and the fugal finale, with its subject in descending sevenths, is bold and effective, but not unduly elaborate. No. 215 is a Capriccio in A flat, by E. Silas, rather striking in its thematic material, and worked up to what might seem an imposing climax. But the talented composer has a surprise in store for us, and comes to an unexpected pianissimo close. The name of Hamilton Clarke appears again on the next three numbers, which consist of a Bridal March, a Lullaby, and a Pastoral Fantasia. The Lullaby is charming, especially the closing bars. No. 219, Allegretto grazioso, by John E. West, is a smooth and flowing soft voluntary, written in a musicianly style, and with very easy work for the pedals. The last three on our list for the present consist of a Melody, an Offertoire, and a Canzone, by King Hall. The first is virtually a song without words for the soft stops, the theme being given to the right hand, with arpeggios in the left and detached notes in the French style for the pedals. The Offertoire is far more elaborate, but yet possesses some characteristics in common—for example, in the slight use made of the pedal board. The Canzone is a piquant and taking piece, and even more than the others would have scandalised organists of the old school, who apparently thought that long-drawn harmonies and syncopations, with the hands and feet kept constantly at work, were best suited to the king of instruments. Their opinions were excusable, as they did not possess organs with three or four manuals and elaborate contrivances for varying the amount of the tone-colour at will.

Old England's a lion. A favourite Song. Composed by Mr. Shield. Arranged by Mary Carmichael.

Take, O take those lips away, and Hark, the lark. Words by Shakespeare. Music by F. E. Gambogi.

Night. Song. Words by Mabel Hyde. Music by Eva Lonsdale.

Love's Nocturne. Words by F. E. Weatherley. Music by Lawrence Kellie.

[Robert Cocks and Co.]

From a number of songs sent by this firm we select the above as less conventional than most of their companions. The first song has a fine "old English" ring about it and a certain amount of patriotic bluster that are very characteristic of our eighteenth century fighting days. Basses and baritones with good lungs, some facility in executing "divisions," and fair declamatory powers may safely add "Old England's a lion" to their stock of ammunition for "bringing down houses." F. Gambogi's settings of Shakespeare's dainty words are charming. Both melody and accompaniment show more than average inventive power. "Night," which has an ad lib. violin accompaniment, is a graceful song suited to a flexible and expressive voice. Mr. Kellie's song is in the style of a serenade. It has a pretty melody—symmetrical, yet several removes from the commonplace—and is not difficult.

Sonata for Pianoforte, in A flat. By Carlo Albanesi. [Stanley Lucas.]

After the hard things that have recently been written about the period of the sonata being past, it requires some courage and faith to publish a composition in this form. Signor Albanesi, however, has the courage of his opinions, and doubtless many pianists will thank him for having thus given them expression. His sonata, if somewhat lacking in depth of sentiment, is brightly conceived, melodious, and affords many opportunities for legitimate executive display.

In the hush of the night. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherley. Music by F. Paolo Tosti.

For the last, last time. Song. Words by G. Hubi-Newcombe. Music by Milton Wellings.

Forget you? Words by Lord Henry Somerset. Music by Francesco Quaranta.

An Eden Fair. Vocal duet for mezzo-soprano and tenor. Words by Mowbray Marras. Music by S. Falchi. [G. Ricordi and Co.]

With the exception of the last-named, the prevailing sentiment in these four compositions is decidedly depressing, and may be said to appeal to those who enjoy the contemplation of the misfortunes of life. Signor Tosti's setting is marred by a false accent in the third line of the poem that imparts a curious egotistical significance to the passage; and it is somewhat surprising to find so experienced a song-writer asking a tenor to sing the word "thee" and the syllable "ing" to the high A and B flat respectively. Elsewhere there are several unnecessary difficulties with regard to articulation placed in the way of the singer. Mr. Wellings's song bears the impress of having been written by one who knows what will please the majority of amateur singers. The music flows on with melodious simplicity, and it is published in three keys. "Forget you?" is of a higher standard, and will appeal to the artistic vocalist. The music happily accentuates the significance of the text, and the moderate range of the vocal part makes the song available by voices of limited compass. The duet is bright and pleasing, although the device of confining both the singers to the same note for eight consecutive bars is suggestive of monotony.

I've wept in dreams. Words by Heine. A slave girl's song. Words by Charles Kingsley. Music by E. Overbeck.

Divertissement pour Pianoforte à quatre mains. Two Impromptus. Pianoforte Duets. By J. H. Bonawitz. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

The above songs form the first number of a proposed series entitled "Artistic Songs," and it is pleasing to be able to say that they are well worthy of being included under this denomination. The music happily reflects the spirit of the text, the setting of the second named in particular effectively echoing the characteristic wildness of the words. Both are published in two keys.

The "Divertissement" comprises a vigorously written introduction, a valse, a bright allegretto, and a tarantella which satisfactorily concludes an effective piece of moderate difficulty. Both the Impromptus are short and interesting to play, and, like the Divertissement, are easily read.

The Orpheus. New series. Nos. 274-282. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Though part-music for male voices exclusively is not so generally popular in this country as in France and Germany, it would seem to be regaining favour. The first of the present series, "Sunset," by Percy Pitt, is a charming part-song of the quiet sort, showing in some degree the influence of Mendelssohn, than whom the composer could not have had a better model. The next is S. S. Wesley's splendid five-part glee "When fierce conflicting passions," one of the finest examples of this peculiarly English class of composition, and justly a favourite with the famed Bristol Orpheus Society. No. 276, "Come to me, dreams of heaven," by Herbert W. Schartau, is a pleasing and studiously unpretentious setting of verses by Mrs. Hemans. Still more simple is "To a kiss," a setting of quaint lines from Peter Pindar by W. Beale, the early eighteenth century composer. "The rook sits high," by King Hall, verses from Eliza Cook, is very lively and tripping, with a plentiful use of the metre known as dactyllic. The final "caw caw" for the second basses on the low D has a comical effect. No. 279, "Bacchanalian Song," by Hamilton Clarke, is in praise of moderate drinkers—those folks who are so detested by the advocates of total abstinence. There is a distinct vein of humour in the composer's words, and the music is bright and jovial. A brief German part-song, with, of course, an English translation of the words, is "Cradle Song," by Arthur Stenz. It resembles the compositions in the same style of Abt, Kücken, and other musicians. Professor Frederick Bridge is an adept in the art of writing humorous part-songs, and certainly not the least successful is "To Phœbe," in which Mr. W. S. Gilbert's verses have received thoroughly appropriate and picturesque illustration, the mock seriousness of the music being capital in effect. The last for the present is "One by one," by Marie Wurm, a simple but effective little part-song with semi-religious words.

Toi. Song. Old French poetry.

A Russian Love Song. Words taken from Marie Corelli's "Romance of two Worlds."

Elëanore. Words by Eric Mackay.

Since my love now loves me not. Words by Heine, translated by Franklin Johnson.

Parted. Words by Tom Hood.

The voice of the beloved. Poetry taken from Marie Corelli's "Soul of Lilith." Music by E. Overbeck.

[Charles Woolhouse.]

Amidst the miles of printed paper over which the eyes of the reviewer have to travel it is refreshing to alight on a batch of songs of such artistic conception as the above. The text is delightfully free from morbid and exaggerative sentiment and the music is of a kind that will afford pleasure to every cultured musician. The first above-named is a truly charming little song, and the second is a manly and spirited composition that should be in the repertory of every baritone. Vocalists will do well to look through these artistic songs, which will amply repay the study they may in some cases require for their effective interpretation.

Dormi, Jesu (The Virgin's Cradle Hymn). For voice with violin or violoncello obbligato. Composed by A. C. Mackenzie.

"I love thee" (Song). Poetry by Thomas Hood. Music by A. Davidson Arnott.

Song and Silence. Song, with an ad libitum part for horn or violoncello. Words by R. S. Hichens. Music by Gerard F. Cobb.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Dr. Mackenzie has wedded the ancient hymn to one of those graceful and expressive melodies that are as delightful to sing as to listen to. The voice part is written within the octave, from E to E, which, combined with the simplicity of the accompaniment and the above characteristics, fairly entitles the setting to be regarded as a valuable addition to the sacred music of the home.

Mr. Arnott's song, enigmatically "dedicated to the 25th of July," is an expressive setting for a baritone voice of the well-known amatory lines that have appealed to so many composers.

In "Song and Silence" a good contrast is presented by the sentiment of the two verses, which the composer has happily reflected by harmonic changes. The accompaniment is artistically varied in character and the obbligato parts effectively introduced. This song is also conceived for baritone vocalists by whom it could be made very effective.

The Royal Academy of Music re-opened on the 27th ult., the Royal College, in its new buildings, on the same day, and the Guildhall School on the 24th ult. During the vacation some structural alterations have been made at the latter Institution. The Principal's room has been enlarged and additional accommodation has been provided for the students in a waiting-room, which is opposite the main entrance. Trinity College pupils resume their studies to-day, and among other kindred Institutions the London Organ School claims attention on its removal to new and handsomely appointed premises in Prince's Street, Cavendish Square. A small concert-hall, with capacity for seating over 100 persons, will be useful for rehearsals and will also afford opportunities to students for practice on an organ enlarged by Willis.

Mr. Basil Tree has again provided the musical public with his useful little Panel Date List, giving full information about all important concerts for the forthcoming season.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Berlin.—The first two novelties to be produced at the Royal Opera during the present season are Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" and Cipollini's one-act opera "Il piccolo Haydn."——During last month Wagner's "Nibelungen" Cycle was excellently given under the direction of Court-Conductor Felix Weingartner. The performances attracted enormous audiences, the theatre being completely sold out.——The Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Siegfried Ochs, will give three Concerts during the coming winter, at which Haydn's "Creation," Berlioz's "Requiem," and Bach's B minor Mass will be performed.——The manager of the Philharmonic Orchestra has arranged for ten Concerts, the programmes of which will contain a considerable number of novelties. Herr Richard Strauss has been appointed Conductor. Whether he will prove a worthy successor to that greatest of all German Conductors, Hans von Bülow, remains to be seen.——The Royal Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Felix Weingartner, will also give ten Symphony Concerts at the Opera House.——From April 1 to October 1, 1895, the Royal Opera will be closed for extensive alterations and partial rebuilding. At present there is no intention of finding another suitable theatre at which performances on the Royal Opera scale could be given, so that for six months next year the Berliners will have to do without grand opera.——The "London Military Band," consisting of about two dozen performers, has been giving a number of concerts in Kroll's Concert Garden and has met with considerable success. The solo cornet and baritone players are singled out for special praise, and the clarinets are commended for the beauty and softness of their tone. Six Scotch pipers in national costume march through the gardens playing their strange music, and the performances of these "Dudelsackpfeifer," as the Germans call them, are not the least popular part of the programmes. They, or their instruments and music, are at any rate a new if hardly an agreeable sensation.——Prof. Karl Halir, formerly of Weimar, has been appointed Konzertmeister (i.e., leader and solo violinist) to the Royal Opera, in place of the lately deceased Heinrich de Ahna. Prof. Halir, who in Germany enjoys the reputation of being one of the foremost living violinists, entered upon his duties on the 1st ult. He will also join the staff of the Königliche Hochschule für Musik as professor of the violin.

Brussels.—The "novelties" to be produced at the Monnaie Theatre during the present season, which began on the 1st ult., are M. Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," M. Emile Mathieu's "L'Enfance de Roland," Herr Jenö Hubay's "Le luthier de Crémone," Signor Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci," M. Massenet's "Thaïs," "Le Portrait de Manon," and "La Navarraise," Bizet's "Djamileh," and César Franck's "Hulda."

Cologne.—Bernhard Köhler is the name of a boy-composer of sixteen years who has lately astonished local musicians with a String Sextet. It was produced at one of the Conservatoire Concerts shortly before the close of the last term, and created such a deep impression that Professor Holländer at once accepted it for performance at his Chamber Music Concerts during next winter. Köhler is a pupil of Professor Franz Wüllner, and is considered a youth of quite exceptional promise.

Dessau.—During the month of November a number of model performances of some of Wagner's operas and music-dramas will be given at the Court Theatre. Madame Cosima Wagner has signified her intention to be present at these performances.

Dresden.—Eugene d'Albert's new opera "Ghismonda" has been accepted for performance at the Royal Opera, and the production is fixed for January, 1895. It is in three acts, and the libretto, which is founded on a poem by Immermann, has been written by the composer.——The "Weber Haus" at Hosterwitz, a suburb of this town, in which Carl Maria von Weber composed his most popular opera, "Der Freischütz," is offered for sale. Up to the present it has been kept in the same condition as in Weber's time, and it is hoped that means may be found to prevent its demolition.

Franzensbad.—At a recent Concert of the Kur-orchestra a new Symphony (No 3 in C minor), by Julius Major, was produced and adjudged an original and effective work in which the characteristic features of Hungarian music—Major is a young professor of music at the teachers' seminary at Budapest—are much in evidence. We have had English, Scotch, Irish, Welsh, Scandinavian, Bohemian, Spanish, and American Symphonies—why not a Hungarian?

Hamburg.—Mr. W. de Manby Sergison's Concert on August 25 in the Kurhaus, in aid of the poor of that city and the sufferers from the earthquake at Constantinople, proved both an artistic and financial success. An interesting selection of songs were effectively sung by Miss Ethel Clarke, Frau von Reibnitz, and Mr. and Miss Schlesinger; Herr Toemlich contributed a violin solo, Mr. Kuhe played two pianoforte pieces, and Herr Brueckner gave violoncello solos and assisted Herr Toemlich and Mr. Sergison in rendering Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor. Mr. Sergison, assisted by Miss Radcliffe and Colonel FitzGeorge as vocalists, also gave an interesting "hour of music" in the Kurhaus before a numerous audience, which included the Duke of Cambridge.

Leipzig.—Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel are publishing a new (the third), thoroughly revised, and greatly enlarged edition of Carl F. Glasenapp's elaborate Wagner Biography. The first volume, extending to the year 1843, is already issued. The new title of the work is "The Life of Richard Wagner."

Lille.—During the present season at the Grand Théâtre a new four-act opera, "Lyderic," will be produced. The composer is M. Eugène Ratez, the director of the local Conservatoire.

Milan.—Signor Leoncavallo, according to Il Trovatore, is writing the libretto of an opera, of which Signor Arturo Buzzi-Peccia will compose the music. The title will be "Non si scherza coll' amore," which seems to point to Alfred de Musset's "On ne badine pas avec l'amour" as the source whence the inspiration of the composer of "I Pagliacci" came in this case. The same paper, which is generally well informed on all matters relating to Verdi, denies the truth of the report that the aged Maëstro is writing a new opera on the subject of "Ugolino."

Munich.—The Court Theatre has lately taken the largest receipts of any performance since its existence—viz., 13,500 marks. The work which produced this result was nothing less than Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Herr Hans Sommer's new opera "St. Foix," will be produced on the 25th inst.

Naples.—Signor Niccolo Daspuro has been appointed director of the San Carlo Theatre. He promises two new operas for the coming season—viz., "Fortunio," by Van Westerhout, and "Silvano," by Mascagni.

Nice.—Madame Adelina Patti has signed a contract according to which she will sing four times in opera during next season. The director of the Opera, M. Lafon, has also engaged Madame Nevada for a series of performances.

Paris.—German papers announce that Herr Humperdinck's fairy tale opera "Hänsel und Gretel" has been accepted for performance at the Opéra Comique and that M. Catulle Mendès is translating the libretto. It may well be doubted whether the essentially German naïveté of the pretty children's story is likely to appeal to the Parisians.——Verdi's "Othello" will be produced at the Grand Opéra on the 15th inst., or perhaps even earlier. After "Othello," Mdlle. Augusta Holmès's "La Montagne noir" will be put in rehearsal. The chief rôles in this work will be sustained by Mdlle. Bréval and M. Alvarez. Mdlle. Holmès is her own librettist.——At the Opéra Comique Verdi's "Falstaff" has been played with M. Fugère in the title rôle. His success has been very considerable, the little patter song "When I was page" having been re-demanded four times.——The Berlioz Cycle to be conducted by Herr Felix Mottl will take place at the Gaité Théâtre between March 15 and April 15 next. M. Xavier Leroux, who is said to know the three works, "La Prise de Troie," "Les Troyens," and "Benvenuto Cellini," by heart, will conduct the preliminary rehearsals; but he will first spend a month with his German colleague to receive his fullest instructions. The rehearsals will begin in January. English admirers of Berlioz who have no chance of going to Karlsruhe will no doubt avail themselves of this opportunity of seeing the master's dramatic works on the stage. In 1896 "The Ring of the Nibelung," "The Mastersingers," and "Tristan" will be given under the same Conductor.——M. Pougin is editing a number of hitherto unpublished letters of Rossini, addressed to Donizetti, Mercadante, and other musicians. A portion of this correspondence has already appeared in the journal Le Temps.

Rome.—There is a rumour that the Minister of War intends to abolish the bands in the Italian Army, or, at any rate, to greatly reduce their number, so that in future there will be only one band to each army corps, or twelve in all. Italian papers are protesting against this proposal, which is made on economic grounds.

St. Petersburg.—Anton Rubinstein is at present staying at Peterhof and hard at work on his newest sacred opera "Cain."——At a Court Concert given at the Castle of Peterhof, àpropos of the wedding of the Grand Duchess Xenia with the Grand Duke Alexander Michailowitch, the Imperial Court-singers appeared for the first time in their new uniform. This consists of a blue dress coat with gold buttons and blue velvet collar, the latter being ornamented with a lyre within a laurel wreath, worked in gold; the waistcoat is white and has gold buttons; the breeches are of the same material as the coat.

Venice.—"Maruzza," a new three-act opera by Pietro Floridia, was recently produced here with much success.——The Duke della Grazia, who is the owner of the Vendramini Palace in which, on February 13, 1883, Richard Wagner drew his last breath, has had a tablet commemorating the event affixed to the building. His Grace has, however, thought fit to place it, not on the principal façade, over or near the door at which the gondoliers land the visitors, but on a wall overlooking a narrow side street, and over the servants' entrance! His reason for this eccentric action is peculiar—the tablet was not in keeping with the style of architecture of the palace! Surely, an Italian duke could afford to have a marble tablet made which would match the style of his palace, even if he had to engage an artist for the task.

Vienna.—On the 4th ult. Anton Bruckner celebrated his seventieth birthday, when the worthy master received the hearty congratulations of his numerous friends. There is something strangely pathetic about this composer, who was sixty before one of his works (the E major Symphony) was performed outside Vienna, and whose eight Symphonies—he is said to be engaged on his ninth—Te Deum, 150th Psalm, and similar large works are declared by one section of music-lovers (the Wagnerians) to be masterpieces by a man of genius, and denounced by the other (the followers of Brahms) as everything that is dull, laboured, and uninspired. Which is right?——Herr Karl Goldmark has written a one-act opera, "The cricket on the hearth," the libretto of which is, of course, founded on Dickens's tale. That the composer of those typically "grand" operas, "The Queen of Sheba" and "Merlin," should follow the fashion by writing a one-act trifle is certainly curious.——M. Massenet's latest opera, "La Navarraise," has been accepted for performance at the Court Opera. The libretto is being translated into German.

Weimar.—A Wagner enthusiast at this place has given the sum of 7,000 marks to the fund now being collected for the purchase of the Oesterlein Richard Wagner Museum in Vienna, besides which he has also placed his villa at the disposal of the committee as a suitable building in which to "house" the unique collection in question.

Wiesbaden.—The new Royal Theatre, on the completion of which 600 workmen are at present employed day and night, is to be opened on the 16th inst., in the presence of the Emperor William. The programme of the inauguration ceremony has been settled as follows: Fanfares to herald the entry of the Emperor; Beethoven's "Zur Weihe des Hauses" Overture; Festival play, with tableaux vivants, by the Intendant of the theatre, Herr G. von Hülsen; Overture and Act II. of "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Paderewski has, by the advice of his physician, postponed his American tour, which was to have commenced this winter, until October next year.

Professor J. F. Bridge has accepted the Queen Victoria Lectureship of Trinity College, London, for the ensuing session, which opens to-day.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Little activity in musical matters has been manifested during the past month, people having hardly settled down after the holidays. The weekly Orchestral and Vocal Concerts at the Clifton Spa, which have been well attended, are really the only musical events that have occurred. Evidence is nevertheless given of considerable activity during the season.

The Saturday Popular Concerts commenced on the 22nd ult., when the customary programme of bright choruses and part-songs, instrumental and vocal solos, and orchestral pieces was presented. Other events are also announced.

Up to the present nothing has been heard whether the Orchestral Concerts of Mr. Riseley are to be continued. Judging from the fact that they have not been sufficiently supported, and that the hall in which they and others are generally held has been taken for two or three months from Christmas by a diorama proprietor, they will not be resumed. It is sincerely to be hoped, however, that this surmise may prove incorrect.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The resolution to put an end to the orchestral war of last season is a real relief to musical society here. Instead of taking the opportunity (however costly to our friends in the West) of hearing more concerts and of comparing renderings, we found ourselves divided into two opposing camps, and it was no river of peace which flowed between.

Messrs. Paterson's prospectus for their concert scheme in connection with the Scottish Orchestra Company is very promising. There will be ten Concerts given by the orchestra, under Mr. Henschel, and for these the following solo artists have been engaged: Lady Hallé, Miss Frida Scotta, Madame Helen Hopekirk, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Achille Rivarde, Mr. Henschel, and Mr. Leonard Borwick. At two of them the programme will be choral. In December Mr. Kirkhope's choir will assist in the first production of two ballads by Scottish composers, "The Kelpie," by Learmont Drysdale, and "Sir Patrick Spens," by W. A. Barratt; and in March the Choral Union, under Mr. Collinson, will produce Mr. Henschel's new "Stabat Mater."

Besides these and the Saturday Popular Concerts by the same orchestra, Messrs. Paterson announce Concerts and Recitals by Dr. Richter and his orchestra, Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Plunket Greene, Josef Hofmann, and others. Messrs. Harrison, in connection with Messrs. Methven and Simpson, announce their third season of four Ballad Concerts. The most important engagements are those of Madame Patti, Madame Albani, Mr. Santley, Mr. Ben Davies, Herr David Popper, and Master Jean Gerardy.

Our active season has been begun unusually early by Sir Augustus Harris's Italian Opera Company, at the Lyceum Theatre, on the 10th ult. No fewer than three novelties were offered—"Falstaff," "La Navarraise," and the "Meistersinger" (for the first time in the provinces)—and it is pleasing to record that these performances were alike most satisfactory and most enthusiastically received. The Ravoglis in "Orfeo" made the success of the week, and "Carmen" (Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli and Mr. O'Mara) was little behind in excellence. "Lohengrin" and the "Huguenots" were not so well performed. From a needlessly large company we must select for special praise Mr. Bispham as Falstaff, Mr. Pini-Corsi as Ford and Beckmesser, Mr. Dufriche as Hans Sachs, Mr. Arimondi as Pistol, Mr. Brozel as Canio and Araguil, and Miss Pauline Joran as Anita and Santuzza. The orchestra, under Signor Sepilli and Herr Leo Feld, was the best we have ever had in the theatre. Signor Sepilli was twice enthusiastically recalled after a surprisingly successful performance of "Die Meistersinger."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The local musical season was ushered in by Sir Augustus Harris's Royal Opera Company, on the evening of the 17th ult., when Verdi's "Falstaff" was produced at the Theatre Royal for the first time in Glasgow. This opera, so highly interesting as the work of an octogenarian who can easily accommodate himself to the modern development of the musical art, had, of course, been well heralded; and a wonderfully strong cast—i.e., strong for the provinces — included Mesdames Giulia and Sofia Ravogli, Messrs. Bispham and Pini-Corsi. The week's programmes included "Lohengrin," "Orfeo," "Pagliacci," "Faust," and "Die Meistersinger," and, so far, at any rate, as a choice of works was concerned, ample provision was made for the most fastidious tastes.

The joint-committee of the Choral and Orchestral Union have almost completed their arrangements for next winter's series of Concerts. The members of the Glasgow Choral Union give their services at the Choral Concerts, while the orchestral performances and the accompaniments to the Oratorios, &c., will be rendered by the Scottish Orchestra, numbering eighty performers, under the leadership of Mr. Maurice Sons. The season will extend over twenty weeks, from the 22nd inst. till March 9 next, during which period ten Classical Orchestral, five Choral, and five Chamber Concerts will be given, and there will also be the usual Saturday Evening Popular Concerts. Verdi's "Requiem," Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be revived, and though nothing has yet been announced regarding the orchestral programmes, it may be taken that Mr. Henschel's arrangements will be fully "up to date." The vocalists already engaged include Mesdames Ella Russell, Henschel, Palliser, Fillünger, and Marian McKenzie; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Iver McKay, Alec Marsh, Bispham, Andrew Black, and Georg Henschel. Lady Hallé, Dr. Joachim, and Mr. Achille Rivarde will be found on the list of the solo violinists; Messrs. Piatti and Taussig are secured as violoncellists; and Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Augarde, and Messrs. Borwick and Stavenhagen are amongst the pianists.

The Saturday Afternoon Recitals at the City Hall, and at St. Andrew's Hall, have been resumed for the season, the latter being now under the management of Messrs. Ewing and MacIntosh, whose enterprise bids fair to prove a marked success. Several of the foremost European organists have been engaged by this firm, as also a goodly array of vocal talent. The Saturday Evening Concerts at the City Hall, now in their forty-first season, and so admirably conducted by Mr. James Airlie, were inaugurated on the 15th ult., when Mrs. Helen Trust and other well-known artists contributed to an excellent programme.

The prospectus of the Paisley Choral Union is one of unusual interest. Never before, indeed, have our friends on the banks of the Cart launched forth so strongly, inasmuch as next season's scheme provides for four Orchestral Concerts and for performances of Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's "Lay of the last Minstrel." The Hamilton Choral Union take up Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the Pollokshields Philharmonic Society is rehearsing Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," and the Rutherglen Choral Society is studying "The Messiah."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

As shadowed forth in these columns some time ago, the Finance Committee of the Corporation, upon the members of which devolves the engagement of a City Organist, has resolved to make no such permanent appointment. Naturally, opinions differed, and there was considerable discussion and opposition to the desires of the majority, on the 14th ult., when the matter was settled; but the resident musical profession at large, as well as the most thoughtful portion of the community, will be of one mind—namely, that the action taken is a wise one. Such an appointment would virtually have given a life-tenure of the console of the St. George's Hall organ to one individual at the cost of all others, however competent they might be, and there are in fact many reasons why the present policy is to be commended. Not the least important of these consists in the opportunity now afforded to the Liverpool public of hearing a succession of really fine performers, such as beyond doubt reside in this city and its immediate neighbourhood. Further, placing a number of different men on the rota insures a continually fresh current of musical thought as well as a spirit of friendly rivalry which can hardly fail to prove beneficial to all concerned.

On the other hand, Mr. W. T. Best was persuaded to come from his retirement on the occasion of the recent visit of the Duke and Duchess of York, and while the audience were waiting the arrival of the royal guests the ex-organist of St. George's Hall gave evidence that neither hands nor feet had lost any of their cunning during the long period which had elapsed since he last appeared in the same place. Having thus been drawn into public life once more, it is to be hoped that with a period of renewed health Mr. Best may yet be induced to give the ratepayers of the city many pleasurable hours.

The plans of the various local and neighbouring choral societies have come but slowly to hand so far, but, as has been unfortunately noted over and over again, Liverpool does not stand high as a choral centre, and it is difficult to create enthusiasm here of the same robust order as exists in regard to such matters in the neighbouring northern county. The programme of the Philharmonic Society is a meagre one when the important position claimed by that body is considered, and the Post Office Choral Society, now conducted by Mr. Clarke, has abandoned the production of large works in favour of part-songs and the like. At the Pro-Cathedral, Mr. Burstall is anticipating the date of his usual Advent Oratorio by announcing Sullivan's "Light of the World" for the 18th and 25th inst.; and the first local Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, under Mr. Minshall, of London, takes place about the same date. It is reported that the Birkenhead Subscription Concerts, after a somewhat chequered career of over a quarter of a century, have ceased, but that the private St. Cecilia Society in the trans-fluvian town is flourishing under Mr. Appleyard. So, also, is the Rock Ferry Society, under Mr. Pemberton, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" being the leading piece; while at Liscard the Musical Society, under Mr. Argent, has undertaken Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride." The last-named Conductor has suggested Mendelssohn's "Athalie" for his advanced class at Wavertree and Cowen's "St. John's Eve" for that at Garston, both these suburban societies being made to come within the pale of technical education, as very properly understood, by the Lancashire County Council.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Vague rumours, rather than definite statements, are abroad as to the prospects of the coming winter. The Carl Rosa Company now occupies the Princes' Theatre, and will, doubtless, as the short campaign progresses, deserve attention by introducing some novelties. The names of the old things given so far need not be chronicled. The syllabus issued by Sir Charles Hallé promises the "Samson and Delilah" of Saint-Saëns, Tinel's "Lay of the Poppies," and a resuscitation of David's "Desert." The re-appearance ("by special request and arrangement") of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington in the "Creation" is underlined, and Herr Lundquist is to be the vocalist at the opening Concert of the 25th inst. M. Paderewski will, during the season, have for the first time here the advantage of orchestral accompaniment; and Mr. Borwick will again be able to charm those who so admired his playing last winter. The "Faust" of Berlioz disappears from the scheme of this year and "Judas" takes its place. Nothing is yet known of the orchestral works; but it is supposed, and hoped, that Edward German's Norwich Symphony may be given. Of course, we shall look for visits by Dr. Richter and for the resuming of the star Concerts of Messrs. Harrison.

Mr. Barrett appeals for subscribers to six Concerts only, and Mr. Lane promises four mixed entertainments. Most of the suburban choral societies will resume their meetings, but no fresh undertakings of interest are announced. The liberal price given for the Concert Hall will enable the directors of the Gentlemen's Concerts to carry on for a time; and it is expected and greatly desired that due encouragement may be given to any efforts made on behalf of chamber music, especially by Mr. Willy Hess and Mr. Bauerkeller.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The coming musical season in Sheffield promises to be a busy one. The choral societies re-commence rehearsals this month, and a number of interesting works are promised. It is, however, a matter of extreme regret among music-lovers in this district that so little opportunity is afforded them of hearing performances of the best modern works. Sheffield is a very active musical centre, but in this direction our big musical organisations are decidedly backward. The great compositions of contemporary composers are overlooked by the committees, and to hear a good new work a visit must be made to a neighbouring town. A dozen admittedly successful works by living English composers might be named, not one of which has as yet been heard in our city.

The Amateur Musical Society (Mr. Schollhammer, Conductor) announces for the winter Concert Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." This Society has from time to time introduced novelties to Sheffield audiences, and it is to be hoped that at the spring Concert such a work will be performed.

The St. Cecilia Musical Society (Mr. W. Brown) propose reviving Handel's "Saul," which has not been given here for many years. "The Messiah" will be performed at Christmas.

The Sheffield Musical Union (Mr. H. Coward) announces a performance on a large scale of Mr. H. Coward's cantata "The King's Error," recently produced at the Crystal Palace.

The Choral Union (Mr. S. Suckley) will give a Concert performance of Flotow's opera "Martha," and at Christmas "The Messiah."

The Upperthorpe Musical Society is rehearsing Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

The prospectuses of the Concert managers are now out and several important Concerts are promised. The series managed by Mr. Chas. Harvey include the visit of Dr. Richter and his orchestra, and, later in the season, Sir Charles Hallé and orchestra. Mr. Harrison's Concerts open with a visit from Madame Patti. The orchestral societies re-commence rehearsals this month.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Sir Smith Child Choral Society, of Tunstall, has decided to hold two Concerts during the coming season. Haydn's "Spring," the Chorus, "Hail, bright abode" (Wagner), and glees by Caldicott and Pinsuti will be produced at the first, and Handel's "Jephtha" at the second. The financial statement for last season shows a profit of £10, but the second effort cost the Society about £13. The generous donation of £100 by Sir Smith Child enables the committee to engage first class artists for all their Concerts.

The band stand provided in the newly opened Burslem Borough Park is to be used by the numerous local instrumental organisations. The Burslem Prize Band received the initial honour.

Gaul's "Holy City" was performed at the Dedication Festival of St. Mary's Church, Tunstall, on the 13th ult. Mr. W. C. Hancock (Longton) conducted, and the Rev. Percy Stowers presided at the organ. Misses Godfrey and Burgess, and Messrs. Hamlet Hopkins and G. Wain rendered valuable aid as soloists.

Unusual interest was shown in the Choral and Instrumental Competition promoted by the Hanley Temperance Society, the Victoria Hall being well filled at both performances on the 15th ult. In the afternoon a Pianoforte and Junior Choral Competition afforded opportunities for a public display of the work of our elementary schools.

Seven competitors entered for the pianoforte competition, but the permission of self-selection of a test piece robbed the contest of its true object. Miss G. M. Sanders, of Burslem, secured premier honours for an excellent rendering of Joachim Raff's "Rigaudon." The appearance of the juvenile choirs increased the interest, and Talke Wesleyan Choir (conducted by Mr. Whewall) secured the award of £3 3s. and a silk banner. The Florence Choir come second on the judge's list. At the senior competition, in the evening, Dr. Hiles again acted as judge. In the violin contest Miss Woolley easily secured the prize. T. W. S. Stephenson's Madrigal "O pure delight" was chosen as the test, and the Upper Hanley Guild Choir gave a good rendering and obtained the prize, the Newcastle Ebenezer Choir being second. The audience displayed a keen interest in the contests, and the Competition should certainly be an annual event.

The North Staffordshire Amateur Operatic Society will apply for permission to perform "The Mikado." The chorus will be reconstituted, to secure the proper balance of parts for active rehearsal.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the coming season "Music in Yorkshire" promises to be at least as plentiful and as interesting as it has been for some years past. The choral societies of the county, which may be said to represent the most active manifestations of the musical art, are for the most part content, or perhaps obliged by the conservatism of public taste, to rely chiefly on the familiar works of their repertory. Giving novelties may ease the artistic conscience, but it has generally been found to impoverish the exchequer. The Leeds Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Alfred Broughton is the Conductor, steers a judicious middle course. Relying upon Mendelssohn's "Elijah," together with the annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" as a safe source of revenue, distinction is given to the prospectus of the season by the inclusion of Dr. Parry's Gloucester Oratorio "Job," which will be given, under the composer's conductorship, for the first time in Yorkshire, with Mr. Plunket Greene in his original part.

The Bradford old Choral Society promises performances of "St. Paul" and "The Messiah"; while at the opening Concert Sir J. Barnby's "Rebekah" and Mr. Randegger's "Fridolin" will be conducted by their respective composers.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society, under Mr. Garland, might be accused of a decidedly stereotyped policy in giving the "Elijah" were it not that it has to provide the chorus for Haydn's "Creation" and Weber's "Freischütz," which works are included in the Choral Concerts that form part of the Subscription series. The Huddersfield Choral Society will temper the novelty of Brahms's "Song of Destiny," coupled with Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist," by giving "The Messiah" and "Creation," the latter for the first time for ten years past. Mr. John Bowling conducts this fine chorus. The Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, now under Mr. Ibeson's direction, promises, in addition to a programme of glees, madrigals, and part-songs, and a miscellaneous Concert, a performance of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri." The Halifax Choral Society, now in the seventy-sixth year of its existence, will give, under Mr. W. H. Garland, performances of "The Messiah," Berlioz's "Faust" (with Sir Charles Hallé's orchestra), and Mr. G. F. Barnett's "Building of the Ship."

The Dewsbury Choral Society, of which Mr. G. H. Hirst is the honorary Conductor, has arranged an exceptionally interesting programme. To Handel's "Messiah" an additional interest will be given by the employment of Robert Franz's edition of the score, which was introduced to the West Riding by the Leeds Philharmonic Society last season. At another Concert, Dr. C. H. Parry's "St. Cecilia's Day" Ode, and the greater part of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is to be performed, together with a Suite by Mr. E. German and the "Meistersinger" Overture. The Keighley Musical Union, under Mr. Burnley, intends giving Haydn's "Seasons," Cowen's "Rose Maiden," and the first part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," followed by Professor Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen." The Bridlington Musical Society is preparing to perform Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under Mr. Bosville's conductorship. At the end of October the sixth Hovingham Musical Festival is to take place. Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Parry's "St. Cecilia's Day," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" are the chief choral works announced. A new work by Mr. E. W. Naylor, "King Arthur," for bass solo, chorus, and orchestra, and a Suite for strings, by Mr. E. Kreuz, are the novelties in a programme that is full of interest. Canon Hudson is the Conductor.

The Leeds Subscription Concerts are to be four in number, two of orchestral and two of chamber music. Sir Charles Hallé's and Mr. Henschel's bands are to appear at the former; while at the first chamber Concert, Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick will give one of their Recitals; and at the second, Dr. Joachim will lead performances of Mendelssohn's String Quintet in B flat and Brahms's Sextet in the same key. The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts not only maintain their character for variety, but show a decidedly upward tendency in point of quality. Among the twelve Concerts and Conversazione of which the season is to consist, Orchestral Concerts by Sir Charles Hallé's, Dr. Richter's, and Mr. Henschel's bands; a Vocal and Pianoforte Recital by Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick, and a Pianoforte Recital by Mr. Josef Hofmann are, perhaps, of the most artistic importance. Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Willy Hess, and Sir Walter Parratt are among the artists engaged at the remaining Concerts. The first of two Subscription Concerts at Wakefield will consist of a Vocal and Pianoforte Recital by Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick; the second is not yet arranged. When it is considered that, in addition to the above—which may be taken as fairly representing the more important Yorkshire concert-giving societies—there are private entrepreneurs galore, and small choral societies whose name is legion, it will be seen that during the coming winter there will be not a little music-making in the three Ridings, of which it must be confessed the more populous West Riding has by far the largest share.

The "Queen of Brilliants," produced at the Lyceum Theatre on the 9th ult., by Messrs. Abbey and Grau, is one of those productions which anon rise like a dazzling rocket in the firmament of the theatrical world, and which defy classification under any denomination. They partake of all but belong to none. The humour of Mr. Brandon Thomas's book and Mr. Jakobowski's music are too weak for the "Queen of Brilliants" to be worthy of the title of a "comic opera." The work is not a burlesque, because it burlesques nothing. Neither can it be termed a musical farce or comedy. It is little else but a gorgeous spectacle in which the personal charms of the heroine and a numerous corps de ballet are displayed in every variety of dress and undress that the mind of man, or, more strictly speaking, that of the costumier, can apparently conceive. Miss Lillian Russell, who personates the heroine, is generously endowed by nature to fulfil the requirements of the part; but it is to be regretted that those requirements make so little demand upon her evident abilities as a vocalist and actress. Much the same may be said of the other principal members of the company, amongst whom Miss Annie Meyers, Madame Amadi, Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. W. H. Denny, and Mr. John Le Hay may be especially commended for their painstaking and earnest endeavours to make bricks without the proverbial straw. The work is a triumph of theatrical stage management and lavish expenditure, but comprises all the elements that have led the public to forsake legitimate comic opera for the hybrid productions suggestive of the music hall.

The value of the Crystal Palace as a holiday resort in unfavourable weather was well shown on August 25, when the Juvenile Fête in connection with the London diocesan branch of the Church of England Temperance Society was successfully celebrated. The day's proceedings began with competitions in solo and choral singing, which were followed by a much enjoyed orchestral performance by Mr. Manns's band, the programme being excellently selected for the occasion. After the interesting ceremony of the march past, the choir, which consisted of about 2,500 voices, assembled on the Handel orchestra, and the cantata, entitled "St. George for England," expressly written for the occasion by the Rev. Charles Kent and composed by Dr. G. F. Huntley, was sung under the direction of the composer. In the cantata the legend of St. George is treated as an allegory symbolical of the triumph of a Christian hero over evil, the dragon being taken as representative of alcohol. This arrangement would doubtless have astonished our national saint, but it has enabled Dr. Huntley to write some effective music of a lyrical character and to include some of the best known "Ancient and Modern" hymns, which were very impressively rendered. Mr. E. Miles had to repeat his performance of the bass solo "Through gaudy palaces," as did also Mr. Stubbs his rendering of the air "Sons of the foam." Mr. W. Hedgcock's management of the great organ reflected great credit on his artistic judgment and skill.

Gounod's charming opera "Philémon et Baucis" attracted a large audience, on the 22nd ult., to the Crystal Palace. The part of the heroine was sympathetically and effectively sustained by Madame Fanny Moody, whose expressive singing was greatly appreciated; Mr. Charles Manners's voice and figure well fit him for the part of Jupiter; Mr. John Child, as Philémon, made excellent use of his pleasing tenor voice; and Mr. Charles Delsart so pleased his audience by his rendering of Vulcan's anvil song that they insisted on its repetition. The concerted numbers were sung in a manner that indicated careful rehearsal; and the refined and interesting instrumental portion was effectively played by the Crystal Palace Orchestra, under the conductorship of Signor Mascheroni. The performance was preceded by a short Concert in which Miss Lily Moody and Mr. William Dever were the vocalists.

The first of a proposed series of Northern Counties' Choral Concerts will be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 27th prox. Two cash prizes, respectively of £20 and £5, are offered for the best and second best performance, by mixed choirs, of Macfarren's part-song "The Sands of Dee"; and two cash prizes of £10 and £5 are similarly offered for the two best renderings, by male-voice choirs, of Hatton's "The happiest land." Only amateur vocalists may take part, but they may come from any part of England, Scotland, Wales, or Ireland. Such contests are to be encouraged, for they largely conduce to the spread of the love of music. May many choirs support the new scheme and may the best win.

Orchestral amateurs living in the South of London will no doubt welcome the inauguration of a new society, entitled the South London Orchestral Society. It is promoted by instrumental members of several musical societies in the district of Clapham Junction, and has already commenced rehearsals in Messrs. Munt's Hall, under the direction of Mr. G. A. Higgs. The intention is to study only the best orchestral music, and with this view the works already chosen for rehearsal are the Overture "Ruy Blas," Mozart's E flat Symphony, Meyerbeer's "Schiller" March, and German's "Henry VIII." Dances.

The Finsbury Choral Association announces three Subscription Concerts, on November 15, January 31, and March 28, under the conductorship of Mr. Cecil J. Sharp. The works to be performed are "Elijah," a Concert Recital of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" (Acts 2 and 3), Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." The Concerts will be given, as usual, in Holloway Hall. Apropos of this Society, the Metropolitan College of Music, with which it is incorporated, continues to flourish under the direction of its able Principal, Mr. C. J. Dale, and has re-opened its doors for the winter term.

Mr. Izard's intelligent and brilliant pianoforte playing was greatly appreciated at his Concert on the 19th ult., at the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution. His rendering of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata was remarkable for clearness of phrasing and masterly execution. He was ably assisted by Miss Helen Saunders and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, the former contributing several songs and the latter playing Beethoven's Romance in F for the violin and taking part with Mr. Izard in Mozart's Sonata in B flat (No. 10).

The Concert season at the Royal Victoria Hall begins on Thursday, the 4th inst., with a Ballad Concert, at which Mr. Sims Reeves will sing, besides many other distinguished vocalists, and Mr. Charles Fry will recite. Mr. Ben Davies will sing at the second Grand Ballad Concert, on the 18th. The other two Thursday evenings of the month—namely, 11th and 25th inst.—will be occupied by Operatic Tableaux Concerts, which, as hitherto, will alternate with Ballad Concerts during the autumn.

Messrs. Harper Brothers, of Brighton, have in their factory an interesting specimen of an old English organ. The soundboards are signed "Schulmzt, 1749," but from the sharp keys on the manuals being white and the natural ones black an earlier date may be assigned to at least this portion of the instrument. The pipes are in a very fair state of preservation, and their tone, as in most old pipes, is good. The organ, after being enlarged, is destined for Portfield Church, Chichester.

An improvement has recently been effected at Queen's Hall by the erection of a Conservatory on the leads over the colonnade in Ridinghouse Street. The Conservatory will be approached from the Small Hall, to which it will serve as a much-needed artists' room. It will also be available as additional accommodation when the Small Hall is used as a ball-room, for which purpose its suitability will no doubt make it much in request.

The Bridlington Musical Society announces that it will resume rehearsing on the 29th inst., when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be commenced, and vocalists desirous of becoming members are requested to communicate at once with Mr. A. E. Peacock, Waverly, Bridlington Quay. Mr. Bosville remains the Conductor, and remembering the past we trust the Society will experience a successful season.

It has been determined that the Welsh National Eisteddfod will be held during the last week in May in the New Market Hall at Llanelly. The guarantee fund already amounts to £2,000, and it is stated that the local gas company have promised to light the building gratuitously during the performances. Such gas companies only exist in Wales.

An appeal is being made on behalf of the widow and children of Mr. Joseph Ridgway, of Southampton, who died after a short and painful illness in August, at the early age of thirty-eight, leaving a large family almost unprovided for. Subscriptions will be received by Mr. Ernest Cooper, Holyrood Chambers, Southampton.

The St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley (Conductor, Dr. C. J. Frost) will give four Concerts during the coming—its tenth—season. The works to be performed are the "Creation," the "Hymn of Praise," "Acis and Galatea," and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch."

A short and attractive Organ Recital was given on the 9th ult., by Mr. R. Browne, in St. Mary's Church, Greenwich Park. The vocalist was Miss Edith Browne.

The Edinburgh University Court has granted the sum of £100 towards the series of historical Concerts that Professor Niecks proposes to give during the winter.

OBITUARY.

We regret to announce the following deaths:—

Joseph Ridgway, professor of music, and formerly a pupil of Sir George Macfarren at the Royal Academy. He died at Bitterne, near Southampton, on August 21, aged thirty-eight.

Frederick Winkley, organist of St. Anne's Church, Eastbourne. He was drowned, on August 30, in the River Ouse, five miles from Lynn, while on a visit.

A. N. Pawle, one of the leading amateur violinists in London, and for many years principal violin of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society. He died on the 2nd ult.

George H. Dreaper, junior member of the firm of W. H. and George H. Dreaper, pianoforte manufacturers, Liverpool. He died on August 24, at his residence, Westbourne Road, West Kirby, aged fifty-five.

Professor Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von Helmholtz, the great German scientist and author of "The Sensations of Tone as a Physiological Basis for the Theory of Music." He died at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, on the 8th ult. We refer to him more fully in another column.

Marino Mancinelli, for many years conductor of the opera houses at Florence, and afterward at Lisbon, and one of the most notable of Italian operatic directors. He was born at Orvieto in 1842 and was a pupil of Mabelini. A short time ago he emigrated to Brazil and became impresario and conductor of the opera at Rio de Janeiro, in which town he committed suicide in a fit of temporary insanity. He wrote a large number of songs and an opera, "I Ribelli," which was produced at Lisbon in 1888. He was the elder brother of Signor Luigi Mancinelli, the well-known conductor of the Covent Garden Opera.

Frau Gabriele Frankl-Joël, formerly a celebrated pianist and teacher. She was a pupil of Hellmesberger, Brahms, and Goldmark, and, at the period of her death, was pianist to the Imperial Court of Austria. She died at Hietzing, near Vienna, on August 27, aged forty-one.

Oskar Eichelberg, director of a Conservatoire of Music named after him, and a royal Kammermusiker; at Berlin, on August 30, aged forty. He was the composer of a two-act ballet, "Nurjahd," which was produced at the Berlin Royal Opera in the early eighties.

Emanuel Chabrier, one of the most original and eminent French composers of the day, at Paris, on the 13th ult. He was born at Ambert, in January, 1841; studied law in Paris, and remained for sixteen years a clerk at the Ministry of the Interior. During his leisure he studied music and began composing. In 1881 he was appointed leader of the choir at the concerts given by M. Charles Lamoureux, and assistant-conductor, in which latter capacity he did a great deal in making the more advanced works of Wagner—such as "Tristan"—known in Paris. An operetta from his pen, "L'Etoile," had been given at the Bouffes Parisiens in 1877; but the work which made his name known was a grand opera, "Gwendoline"; this was first performed at Brussels in 1886, in 1889 it was played with great success at Carlsruhe, under Felix Mottl, and in 1890 at Munich, under Hermann Levi. It was not till January 4 last that this striking work, one of the most difficult and most beautifully orchestrated in the whole range of modern opera, was performed at the Paris Grand Opéra. The unfortunate composer was then already struck with partial paralysis of the brain, and at the rehearsals he seemed unconscious of the fact that the music which he heard was his own. One of his most popular works is the Orchestral Rhapsody on Spanish Airs, entitled "España," a brilliantly-scored and altogether fascinating work, which was exceptionally successful. His "Roi malgré lui" was produced at the Opéra Comique in 1887. A second unfinished grand opera, "Briséis," as well as several other works, are in manuscript. Chabrier is another addition to the list of French composers who found more honour in foreign countries than in France.

Frau Toni Kohn-Speyer, a daughter of the well-known composer of dance music, Labitzky, As Fräulein Labitzky she belonged for fifteen years to the Frankfort-on-Main opera. She died recently at Königstein.

Gustave Frédérix, for thirty-five years dramatic and musical critic of the Indépendance Belge, and a member of the Académie Royale de Belgique. His smartly written critiques were distinguished by sound taste and a refined style, and he was generally esteemed one of the best critics in Belgium. He died at Brussels on August 25, aged sixty.

Cesaro Galliera, composer of a successful opera, "Zagranella," and another, entitled "La Dama bianca d'Avenello." In later years he resided at Munich, where he was much esteemed as a teacher of singing; the famous Wagner singer, Herr Vogl, being one of his pupils. He died at Salo, Italy, aged sixty.

Pio Ferrari, a professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Royal Institute at Parma. He died at Fabiano.

Magnus Peterson, organist and choirmaster of St. John's Church, Wellington, died suddenly on June 30.

Mrs. Lyne-Stephens, who, fifty years ago, under the name of Louise Duvernay, was considered one of the finest operatic dancers. We refer to her at length in another column.

Leon Mayeur, for many years first clarinet in the orchestra of the Paris Grand Opéra, to which post he was appointed on the strong recommendation of Meyerbeer. In 1870 he became sub-conductor of the Garde Républicaine and founder of the Concerts at the Jardin d'Acclimation. He was also known as a skilful player on the saxophone. He did much to improve this instrument and composed and arranged a great deal of music, including a "Method," for it. He died recently at Cannes, aged fifty-two.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GREEK MUSICAL NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Mr. Torr informs me in your last issue that his theory of the Greek notation is not that of M. Vincent. Mr. Torr may reasonably be supposed to know what his own theory is; but is he familiar with that of M. Vincent? I incline to think, from the manner in which he repudiates it, that he is not, and that he has been misled by the term "Pythagorean diesis," which M. Vincent somewhat oddly adopted. The more Mr. Torr develops his views, the more they seem to me to be an exact replica of M. Vincent's; but I need not take up your space with a demonstration of this, as the point is of subordinate importance.

I also learn from Mr. Torr's last letter that I was wrong in assuming that he holds the Greek notes to represent fixed pitches. I apologise, and withdraw my letter of July 30 directed to this point. In palliation of my obtuseness, however, I trust I may be allowed to mention that many others understood Mr. Torr just as I did.

I deny altogether that Aristides and Gaudentius are describing music different from that catalogued by Mr. Torr's grand authority Alypius. Mr. Torr's own date for Aristides (The Musical Times, p. 555, col. 2) is "about 500 years after Aristoxenus." Of the date of Gaudentius nothing is known. But he ignores Ptolemy's work on music, and has been supposed, therefore, to have written earlier than that writer. The latest authorities, however, place him about 390 A.D. Now the date of Alypius is A.D. 360, or later.* Gaudentius explicitly says that the ancients used the "homotones," and that the latter were also employed, at successive intervals, to express the "pycna." Nothing whatever is said by either author as to a reduction of the notes of the octave from twenty-one to twelve; and that they had no such reduction in view when writing the passages quoted is sufficiently obvious from their mention of the enharmonic genus in the same breath.

Furthermore, as Professor Bellermann has shown ("Die Tonleitern . . . der Griechen." Berlin, 1847, pp. 69-77), there did actually exist in the original MSS. of Aristides a complete list of the fifteen keys, in the three genera, his "reduced" scales being merely intended as an elucidation of the fundamental forty-five as exhibited by Alypius.

Of two notes such as K and Λ, says Mr. Torr, Aristides took in all cases the first, whereas Gaudentius seems to have taken the second. This is also an error. From pages 25 to 28 of Aristides there are four lists of the notes. In the second and third lists every note is set forth (allowing for the lacunæ of copyists); the order of the second list being strictly alphabetical. The fourth list also gives the alphabetical order, tabulating all the modifications of each letter-form. Gaudentius only enumerates the notes from Ω upwards to N, but within these limits he gives all the letters. In the first list of Aristides, which contains two scales, each being composed of notes a tone apart, notes such as Λ are necessarily omitted. That K and I in the third list fall next to each other in a scale by semitones artificially constructed for teaching purposes (one of those "catapycnose" scales which Aristoxenus expressly condemns as utterly foreign to the true principles of Greek music), proves no more than that K and I might occur in music a semitone apart, which no one dreams of denying (see, for example, "Mese" and "Trite Synemmenon" in the Æolian diatonic genus).

So much for Aristides and Gaudentius. Mr. Torr is quite right in "presuming that [my] notion is that this [among other reasons] will justify the transcript in giving D natural for K as well as I." I may add that Bellermann, Fortlage, Westphal, Riemann, Oscar Paul, and Gevaert are of the same opinion.

Now as to the two different forms of pycnum. In the diazeugmenon tetrachord of the Æolian and Iastian keys (including the hyper- and hypo- scales) the notes skip a letter. In the remaining keys the letters are consecutive. If Alypius had regarded the pycna as identical in tuning, says Mr. Torr, he would not have needed the Æolian form at all, and could have used the other form throughout (p. 555, col. 1, ad init.). The simple answer is, that Alypius had no choice: he didn't invent the thing. It had come into existence certainly 700 years (and, according to Westphal, as long as 1,000 years) before he wrote. All he did was to put on record the signs used in practice, which signs, prior to the addition of the vocal notes, had passed through various stages of development, and which consequently exhibited many anomalies. It is terribly bad logic to say: "This is an anomaly; therefore it did not exist." Our own notation is full of anomalies. That of the Greeks was more anomalous than ours, wherein there is nothing remarkable when one bears in mind the multiplicity of their tunings.

Mr. Torr's theory of the pycna necessitates the conclusion that certain kinds of tuning were confined to certain key-pitches; which is clean contrary to the testimony of the Greek writers. They all (except Aristoxenus) give a standard two-octave scale, to which every variety of generic tuning is applicable, and which may be transposed into all the various keys (tonoi or tropoi). Why does Ptolemy reject the Hypo-Iastian mode of the Aristoxeneans? Because, as he plainly states (Lib. II., c. 11, ad fin.), its intervals are exactly the same as those of the Hypo-Dorian or Hypo-Phrygian, only at an intermediate pitch. The key was, in fact, often spoken of as the "lower Hypo-Phrygian." Yet Mr. Torr would have us believe that the tuning of the pycna in this key was quite different from that in the other two. When he challenges The Musical Times to prove the contrary, he mistakes his position. It is he that is on the revolutionary side, and it is for him to prove his case.

There is not the least difficulty, however, in disproving the contention that the pycnum K Λ M could not represent the chroma toniaion of Aristoxenus or the chroma syntonon of Ptolemy. In Book II., cap. 15, Ptolemy informs us that the only chroma used in his time was the syntonon, and that this chroma was employed in all the seven principal keys, in mixture with a form of the diatonic. Now six of these seven principal keys of Ptolemy happen to be just the keys which, in Alypius, always use the K Λ M form of pycnum. Ptolemy furnishes the ratios; Alypius furnishes the notation. Put the two side by side, and the whole reckless assumption of Mr. Torr falls to the ground.

I take Ptolemy's "Hypodorian ἀπὸ νήτης" (Table 7), which, as he explains in the text, is the middle octave of the two-octave lyre, from the 5th string to the 12th inclusive (counting upward), the whole lyre being tuned according to the scheme in Book II., cap. 11, table 4. The lowest note of this octave is the "mese in power" (i.e., the "mese" of Alypius), and the octave is thus the upper half of Alypius's Hypodorian (see Bellermann, Op. cit., p. 13). Therefore we get :—

The distance between M and K is here $\frac{8}{7}$, something more than a full tone of $\frac{8}{9}$; and it is clear that K has more than "moved into the place already occupied by I." It has even moved past it. Or, to use Mr. Torr's other mode of expression, "the third note of one [instrumental] group" has most markedly been brought "into collision with the first note of the next group." 2162

Had an Aristoxenean tuned the octave, and not a Pythagorean, K would of course fall exactly into the place of I, or (though the mode of expression is to be deprecated), "D flat would become D natural."

The mutual interference of group and group is also demonstrated by Boethius. In Book IV., cap. 3, he gives the letters of the Lydian mode in the three genera. In Book IV., cap. 8, he calculates the exact ratios of the intervals in the same three genera, speaking in both cases, be it noted, not of the music of his own time, but of the epoch when the enharmonic was still in use. Reckoning from the "mese" (I) as 4,608, he proves that "paranete synemmenon" in the diatonic genus (Γ) and "paranete diazeugmenon" in the enharmonic (Δ) are both represented by the same length of string, 3,888. But Δ is the third note of one group, and Γ is the first note of the next group.

It is highly remarkable that similar results are immediately obtainable, by simple arithmetic, from Mr. Torr's own admissions. O Ξ N is a pycnum in the Hypo-Lydian chromatic, and may therefore, says Mr. Torr, represent two successive intervals of $\frac{1}{3}$-tone (chroma malakon). Hence O to N may be $\frac{2}{3}$-tone. Now O to M is only $\frac{1}{2}$-tone, for these notes are the "meses" of the Iastian and Phrygian keys respectively, which are known from Pseudo-Euclid, Aristides, Gaudentius, Bryennius, and (incidentally) Ptolemy to be a semitone apart. Therefore N may lie higher in pitch than M. But N is the third note of one group and M the first note of the next. Furthermore, Mr. Torr permits us to stretch O-N to $\frac{3}{4}$-tone (chroma hemiolion), and to compress M-Λ to $\frac{1}{4}$-tone (as part of an enharmonic pycnum in Dorian key). Add the semitone O-M to the latter interval and we get O-Λ equal to $\frac{3}{4}$-tone—i.e., equal to O-N. Therefore Λ and N may be tuned to the same level of absolute pitch, M being squeezed out altogether. And Λ and N belong to different groups.

The foregoing three independent demonstrations completely annihilate the first objection to the transcript—viz., that if M and I denote C and D, K must belong to a note in between (p. 485, col. 2, ad init.). Pass we on to the second "set of doubts."

"There is no reason for supposing that the seven ['natural' or 'original' Greek notes] were exactly in the places assigned to them in the modern tempered scale" (p. 485, col. 2). I fear, Sir, that the inordinate length to which my letter has already run will prevent my fully investigating this question; so I will simply refer Mr. Torr to the opinions of the received authorities, who have made Greek music the study of a lifetime.

"Aristoxenus," says Bellermann (Op. cit., p. 22), "determines by ear the interval of the octave, and divides it by ear into six equal parts, which he calls whole tones. Each such tone he divides into two equal semitones—i.e., he only recognises equal temperament."

"Although the Greeks," says Westphal (Griechische Harmonik und Melopœie, third edition, 1886, p. 49), "had no inkling, apart from the Hydraulis, of modern keyed instruments, we must nevertheless suppose, according to the Harmonics of Aristoxenus, that the equally-tempered tuning occurring thereon was well known in the Greek musical Praxis."

Bellermann and Westphal are, of course, perfectly familiar with the passage Mr. Torr quotes from Aristoxenus (pp. 45-6). If Mr. Torr is acquainted with these authors, it is his business to refute them; and until he does this, The Musical Times is fully justified in following their lead. If, on the other hand, Mr. Torr is not acquainted with the standard works I cite, I submit that he is not qualified to discuss the question, much less to lay down the law.

Now, for the sake of argument, let us suppose that Bellermann, Westphal, and The Musical Times are all wrong as to the Aristoxenean tuning, and that Mr. Cecil Torr was born to put them all right. Here, expressed in mean ("equally tempered") semitones, is an exact view of the Aristoxenean intervals (tense diatonic) as Mr. Torr assumes them—

Where the middle tone is sharper than two mean semitones by the $\frac{1}{22}$th part of a mean semitone; the other tones are flatter than two mean semitones by the $\frac{1}{132}$th part of a mean semitone; and each semitone is flatter than a mean semitone by the $\frac{1}{220}$th part thereof. And Mr. Torr expects us to believe that these minute differences "vitiate the transcript." I say that it doesn't matter a button one way or the other; and that if this is the only offence (and that a doubtful one) that he has to allege, he might have spared ink and paper and the valuable space of The Musical Times.

Further: Mr. Torr entirely ignores the fact that our modern notation is by no means tied down to the expression of exactly equal semitones. Up to the end of the sixteenth century it was universally held to express Pythagorean (di-tonic) tuning. Thenceforward, up to the present moment, it has been very commonly employed to denote the following intervals:—

and the notes are often actually executed at these intervals by unaccompanied strings or trained quartet voices. The notation is, therefore, elastic within certain limits, and, in my opinion, is perfectly adapted to represent such a scale as Mr. Torr has put forward.

I submit that the above arguments form a complete vindication of the transcript against the particular objections of Mr. Torr. I have not the least personal interest in M. Reinach one way or the other, and, if I thought him wrong, should say so without hesitation. Whether any conceivable arguments, however potent, will convince Mr. Torr, is problematical; but I am content to leave the decision to impartial judges.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Ernest Bergholt.

London, September 3, 1894.

THE HYMN TO APOLLO.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—In your note at the end of my letter in your September number (pp. 626, 627) you take exception to my statement that "the K Λ M form fits the three cases in Aristoxenus where the pycnon has intervals of a quarter, three-eighths, and a third of a tone respectively; while the I Λ M form fits the fourth case, where the pycnon has intervals of half-a-tone." You say that you are at a loss to discover what grounds I have for "this very large assumption." Surely the grounds are obvious. There is an interval of a tone between I and M; so the I Λ M form fits the case where the pycnon has intervals of half-a-tone. And as K comes between I and M, there is an interval of less than a tone between K and M; so the K Λ M form fits the cases where the pycnon has intervals of less than half-a-tone. I maintain that, as the K Λ M form is employed in the hymn, the hymn had pycna with intervals of less than half-a-tone.

I must confess that I am rather puzzled by your statement that "nothing that Mr. Torr has said has caused us to alter our opinion that M. Reinach's transcript is perfectly correct as regards the notes; and that in all probability the tuning employed was the toniaion, though either of the others is perfectly possible." I observe that you qualify your opinion that "the transcript is perfectly correct" with the words "as regards the notes"; so I suppose that you have come to share my views about the use of equal temperament. But the transcript cannot be perfectly correct as regards seven of the fourteen notes, unless the tuning was the toniaion, for it determines the position of these seven notes by reckoning that the pycna had intervals of exactly half-a-tone. Nevertheless, you say that it is perfectly possible that the tuning was not the toniaion, though in all probability it was. This only seems to be another way of saying that in all probability these seven notes are right, but that it is perfectly possible that they are wrong.

In his letter, Mr. Bergholt quotes a statement of mine that, inasmuch as there were twenty-one signs for notes in the octave, there must have been twenty-one notes. From this he "infers" that my contention is that the twenty-one signs represented twenty-one notes at fixed intervals. And the rest of his letter is occupied in showing that the intervals could not be fixed. I am not going to write a defence of views that are not mine; but I may remark that Mr. Bergholt would have some trouble in establishing his postulates that the tone was always a major tone, and that the fourth was always a perfect fourth.—Yours, &c.,

Cecil Torr.

[We consider that our readers are now in possession of sufficient evidence for and against the accuracy of Mr. Reinach's transcript to enable them to form their own opinion. Correspondence on the subject must therefore now cease.—Ed., M.T.]

HOW COMPOSERS COMPOSE.

To the Editor of "The Musical Times."

Sir,—Much well-bred scorn has been recently evoked by the innocent suggestion, to be found in a column of your journal, that "some eminent composers have the habit of resorting to a keyed instrument when scoring." The idea that such a thing ever occurs "creates amusement in the mind of any musician." Any composer detected in such an act would at once admit (if he had brains enough to quote Shakespeare) that he ought to be "written down an ass." None but the veriest amateur would ever rush to the pianoforte or organ when orchestrating, as none but a tyro swimmer would use corks.

Let us see which view denotes most unfamiliarity with the modus operandi of composers. I am not straining to concoct a clever paradox, but to ascertain a sober matter of fact.

I regret to have to resuscitate, even for a moment, the inscription on the Whitchurch organ—more calculated, I fear, to produce a cold shiver in your readers than that on the wall in the Biblical monarch; and I note the humorous comparison to which I expose myself with Uncle Dick ("David Copperfield"), who could not keep King Charles's head out of the memorial. It is, alas! in indirect connection with my uncle's brass plate that the point has arisen.

The hapless plate says "Handel" (in deference to your habit I have abandoned the native orthography of the great Saxon's name) "composed Esther on this organ": hinc illæ lacrymæ! In these latter days of research, a crowd of busy mockers start up and say, "none but a musical dunce would attach any definite meaning to this absurd statement." The idea of the composer, who more than all others was noted for the flow of melody welded to counterpoint which gushed from him automatically, being obliged to verify his ear, or assist his invention by mechanical means! Here we have the fallacy which underlies the whole objection, and brings us to the point. The objectors will persist in assuming that the only reason for a composer trying phrases over on an instrument is necessity for aid to an untrained ear. The reverse is the case. The idea that this implies weakness is the popular, and what Von Bülow would call the "naturalistic" view, founded on our experience of the fashionable lady valse composer, who (to punish the sins of the community) is gifted with a diabolical power of stumbling on a washy tune in the course of chance-meandering over the keys. Let us follow the process of evolution by steps. The next stage is the student, who has been learning to score, say, three or four months; if he has ordinary aptitude he will have arrived at the point when it is easier for him to forget that there is such a thing as a pianoforte. We come next to the erudite musician, and in this class the mode of transcription is infinitely varied. I am speaking only of what I have seen personally, with the exception of the case of Meyerbeer. I begin with Balfe, who at the time I speak of was the composer of nineteen successful operas, and would hardly be called "the veriest amateur." I have, when a boy, been hours with him when composing, and he was never away from the pianoforte for a quarter of an hour. I have seen Gounod trying over phrase after phrase on the pianoforte or American organ, and reproducing with marvellous skill the combinations of wood and brass; the hands could not, of course, grasp the whole, but the typical notes were skilfully selected to the exclusion of the dross. I only knew Meyerbeer slightly, and never saw him compose; but in the course of my musical study in Germany I came across abundant secondary evidence from his intimate friends of his mode of working, and he was constantly compressing his orchestral effects into the compass of a handful of key-notes, and was, in a perfectly intelligible and not incorrect, though elliptical sense, "composing at or on the pianoforte." I was familiar with the habits of the late Sir William Cusins, under whom I studied instrumentation for years. Am I stigmatising that most estimable and learned artist as a "very amateur" when I say that, gifted as he was with great power of compressing a score, there was hardly a phrase of wood or brass which he did not translate on the pianoforte? On the other hand, Herr Trenkler (Dresden), under whom I also studied, in the many years I have known him never once left the desk, or showed any desire to hear a phrase otherwise than—as Pat would say—with his eyes.

It has occurred to me to consider whether an acute sense of pitch has any bearing on the habit; but of those composers whom I have mentioned, Balfe, Gounod, Sir William Cusins, and, I believe, Meyerbeer, had a stereotyped diapason in the brain, and Herr Trenkler, though an admirable conductor, is somewhat less conspicuously saturated with the notes of the scale.

On the whole, the question is not one of power at all, but of temperament, of habit, or, as a Frenchman would say, of genre.

If those who attack the Whitchurch plate said merely, "Prove to us the concrete fact that Handel composed 'Esther' on this organ," they would be making a formidable case; but they say "the very idea is nonsense in the abstract," and there they lay themselves open to a crushing reply.

Of course I assume that my antagonists, whom I have never found wanting in generosity, will give me credit for stating correctly what I have seen, on a subject where we all have a common interest. When my uncle put up the plate he considered that he was addressing himself to persons of sound mind, endowed with ordinary reasoning powers, who would not exact from the space of two lines a detailed description of a process to which, I am ashamed to say, I have devoted a column of your valuable space. "Composing on an instrument" is a phrase which cannot be quite literally construed. You should apply to it the caustic observation of Lord Justice James, dealing with a whimsical testator: "even a will must have a reasonable construction if possible."—I remain, Sir, yours truly,

Edward Cutler.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—My attention has been called to some correspondence in a Bournemouth paper concerning a paragraph which appears in The Musical Times this month. As the author of that paragraph, let me at once disclaim (though it surely should be unnecessary to do so) any intention of disparaging the efforts of those who have already done good service to the cause of choral music in Bournemouth. I have had occasion, more than once, to speak in the highest terms of their enterprise. What I meant, and what, so far as I am capable of expressing myself, I said, was to the effect that opportunities of hearing adequate performances of the great oratorios were "few and far between" in this town; and if those who dissent from this statement will give us a list of such performances which have taken place in Bournemouth during the past two years, we shall, without any waste of words, see who is right.

That Oratorio concerts have not been found to pay does not affect the question.

I wish to add that Mr. Godfrey was not responsible for the paragraph, nor did he in any way prompt it. As a matter of fact, however, one of the terms of his agreement with the Corporation, which was entered into at the early part of the year, was that he should, if called upon, form a choral society in the winter months.—Believe me, &c.,

Your Correspondent for Wilts and Hants.

Mr. Frank Bartlett, under whose able direction the last Concert of this Society was given, only undertook the duties pro tem. Mr. South, the Organist of Salisbury Cathedral, still retains the post of Conductor.

BACH'S FANTASIA IN G.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have often been struck with the following bar from Bach's Fantasia in G, Peters' Edition, Vol. IV., page 61. The low pedal B is, so far as my experience goes, unique—

Perhaps some of my fellow-readers can tell me whether it is a rare case of lapsus calami or a printer's error which has become perpetuated.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Brading, Isle of Wight.—An interesting selection of sacred music was performed after evening service, on August 26, in the Parish Church. The vocalists were Mrs. Duke and Mr. B. Eyre, and Mr. W. C. Edwards and Mr. Russell were the organists.

Brighton.—During the week ending August 28 Mr. E. W. Holmyard gave a series of Organ Recitals in the Aquarium, playing excellent selections from the writings of Bach, Handel, Merkel, Capocci, and E. Cutler.——During the past month Mr. Arthur Rousbey's company have given in the theatre successful performances of "The Daughter of the Regiment," "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "Pagliacci."

Bungay.—An open-air Concert was given by the local Choral Society, in the grounds of Upland Hall, on the 5th ult.; but heavy rain kept many persons away and marred the enjoyment of those present. In addition to several part-songs, &c., vocal and instrumental pieces were contributed by Miss J. Hartcup, Miss V. Marshall, Miss L. Kemball, Mrs. E. Watts, Miss K. Browne, and Mr. R. Price (the Conductor).

Cape Town.—On many occasions this town has shown its appreciation of good music, and the enthusiastic reception given to Sullivan's "Golden Legend," produced here on August 30, in the Good Hope Hall, might therefore have been expected. When the choice of this work was made there were some who doubted the capabilities of the choir to meet the requirements of the music. Happily, however, bold policy prevailed, and the decision was amply justified by results. The choir, on the whole, gave an effective rendering of the beautiful choruses, and the orchestra, led by Mr. George Israel, bravely attacked its difficult task. Miss Sara Harris, a very young and promising vocalist, made a successful début in the sympathetic part of Elsie; Mrs. Griffith-Vincent's voice was advantageously displayed in the music of Ursula, and Mr. Fallowes and Mr. Lowinger respectively as Prince Henry and Lucifer proved themselves to be capable vocalists. Great praise is due to Mr. T. Barrow-Dowling for his skilful conducting. ——On the following Monday the "Elijah" was performed to a crowded audience, Mr. Barrow-Dowling's forces again proving themselves admirably trained and reliable executants. The principal soloists were the same as appeared at the performance of "The Golden Legend," but they were augmented for the double quartet by Mrs. Edward Mills, Miss Powrie, Mr. Cawse, and Mr. Gent, all of whom rendered able assistance. "The Golden Legend" was repeated on the 6th ult., when a still larger attendance than on its first presentation testified to the deep impression the music had previously made.

Cardiff.—The district Choral Festival at Margam Abbey was celebrated on August 30, under the auspices of the Glamorgan Division of the Llandaff Church Choral Association. About 600 voices, under the direction of Mr. R. Seaton, Organist of the Abbey, took part in the admirably arranged service, which included Sullivan's anthem "O love the Lord."

Droitwich.—A successful performance of Sir Joseph Barnby's Scriptural idyll "Rebekah," under the conductorship of the composer, was given, on August 30, in the Salters' Hall, in aid of the local hospital. The choruses were well sung by Miss Scriven's Choral Society, assisted by thirty-five members of the Cardiff Choral Society and volunteers from Worcester and Malvern; and the solos were efficiently rendered by Miss Honeybone, Mr. C. Fredericks, and the Rev. J. H. Lambert. These vocalists also assisted, with Mr. D. Cullen, in the miscellaneous second part of the programme, which contained a violoncello solo played by Miss Broome, and an effective interpretation of Pinsuti's unaccompanied part-song, "The sea hath its pearls," by the Cardiff Choir, under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Gibbon.

Durban, Natal.—Miss Macintyre's singing has raised remarkable enthusiasm here. She was heard at three Concerts given on August 7, 9, and 10 respectively, and at each elicited the eulogistic praise of the local press. At the second Concert Miss Macintyre was ably assisted by the Male-Voice Choir which, under the conductorship of Mr. Crane, gave an admirable selection of glees, in some of which solos were sung by Mr. Macfarlane and Mr. Seidle. Miss Nightingale's pianoforte playing was greatly admired, Mr. Hollander contributed a flute solo, and Mr. Israel's skill as a viola player was advantageously displayed in a "Fantasie" by Vieuxtemps. Miss Adams and Mr. Jonquier acted as accompanists.

Folkestone.—The fine new organ recently erected by Messrs. Hill and Son in the Parish Church was opened by a special Dedicatory Service on the 11th ult., when an artistic selection of organ music was performed by Mr. Alfred Oake, Organist of the Church. On the 19th ult. Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm was sung by the choir. It is proposed to give a series of Organ Recitals on Wednesday afternoons.

Invercargill, New Zealand.—The Choral Society entered upon its fourth season on July 17 when, as well as on the following evening, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea" were performed in the Theatre Royal. The last-named work was sung here for the first time on this occasion, and both were excellently rendered by Mr. Charles Gray's well-trained forces, consisting of about ninety voices and an orchestra numbering some thirty instrumentalists, the latter led by Mr. Blue. The solos in Mendelssohn's work were sung by Mrs. Ross, the Misses Waymouth, and Mr. Ernest Packer; and the principals in the cantata were Miss Geddes, Mr. E. B. McKay, and Mr. Packer. Miss Lithgow gave valuable assistance at the pianoforte.

Lakenham, Norfolk.—The organ in St. Mark's Church, which has been entirely re-built by Messrs. Norman, Bros. and Beard, was opened on the 2nd ult. by Dr. Bates, who performed an excellent selection of music after evensong to a crowded congregation.

Liverpool.—Mr. W. S. Dobson gave, on the 1st ult., two attractive Organ Recitals in the St. George's Hall. Many would-be listeners were unable to obtain admission to the evening Recital, and it says much for the audience's appreciation of the "king of instruments" that a "Sonata da Camera," by Peace, should have been repeated.

Loughborough. — The annual Baxter-gate Sunday School Concert took place on the 11th ult., in the Town Hall. Upwards of 120 young people assisted in an entertainment consisting of action-songs, choruses, and instrumental performances in a manner that reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. G. Adcock, and that well sustained the interest of a large audience.

Lowestoft.—During the past month two performances were given in the handsome Concert-room on the Pier of Mendelssohn's rarely heard operetta "Son and Stranger." It is a great pity that this bright and cleverly constructed little work is not better known. There are interesting solos for the four chief characters engaged, while there is some good concerted music and a dramatic finale. The work can practically be given in a drawing-room, the "properties" required being but few, and as Messrs. Novello now issue an acting edition, it is readily available to all; indeed, we see no reason to doubt that it would have a run if properly presented at one of our smaller theatres. Mr. L. Langton was the Mayor; Hermann (the son) was impersonated by Mr. C. Butler, who has a pleasing tenor voice; Kauz, the pedlar, was played by Mr. B. Black, whose spirited acting deserves commendation; Ursula was well played, and her music sung with artistic refinement by Miss Dora Barnard; and Lisbeth was impersonated by Miss Lilian Redfern, who has a fresh young voice and ought to do well. The accompaniment was played on the pianoforte by Dr. Bunnett, of Norwich.

Malvern.—During the last month Mr. Allan Paterson has continued his excellent Wednesday afternoon Organ Recitals in the Priory Church, of which he is the organist. His programmes evince intimate acquaintance with the best works of the great writers and the performances can scarcely have failed to have exercised an elevating influence on the musical taste of those who attended.

Marton-cum-Grafton.—Handel's "L'Allegro" and "Il Pensieroso" were performed on the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. R. Lunn. Considering the various difficulties that had been experienced in preparation, the performance was a very creditable one. Miss Fannie Sellers, who undertook the arduous chief part in "Pensieroso," was in excellent voice, and rendered it admirably; and the other vocal parts received justice from Miss Wilson, Miss M. Tomlinson, Mr. A. H. Lunn, and Mr. Wilson. The accompaniments were played by a small but efficient orchestra.

Melbourne, Australia.—Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater," which was performed for the first time in Australia on May 30, at St. George's Presbyterian Church, under the direction of Mr. F. Albert Mallinson, proved so successful that it was repeated on July 23, when Madame Anna Steinhauer was again the principal vocalist. Mr. Mallinson, in addition to conducting the "Stabat Mater," played organ solos by Bach, Grieg, Dubois, and Lemaigre.——An excellent Concert was given on July 18, in Chalmers Presbyterian Church, in aid of its funds. The programme, which included two appropriate recitations by Miss Edie Cooke, was of an attractive character, and was ably carried out, under the direction of Mr. R. J. Œhr, by Miss Smith, Miss G. Bevan, Miss Buchan, Miss D. Kenny, Miss Murdock, Messrs. W. E. Nott, P. V. Bevan, D. Bevan, A. Ford, J. W. Samuels, and a quartet from St. Mark's Church of England Chior. Mr. Œhr also gave a short lecture on Beethoven, and Mr. E. J. Watkin played two organ solos.

Norwich.—At the annual meeting of the Norwich Orchestral Society, held on the 11th ult., it was decided to put Handel's "Alexander's Feast" into rehearsal for performance at the next Concert.

Plymouth.—A new Society, entitled the Plymouth Philharmonic Society, has recently been started under the honorary conductorship of Mr. A. C. Faull, who has for several years past successfully carried on an Oratorio Choir in connection with Sherwell Congregational Church. Three Concerts will be given at the Guildhall during the coming season, and the works announced are selections from the recent Handel Festival, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and Gounod's "Redemption." The admirable company of solo vocalists secured for the Handel Concert includes Madame Clara Samuell.

Pontypridd.—The Welsh Wesleyans of Glamorganshire held, on August 27, in the new Town Hall, a successful Musical Festival, under the conductorship of Mr. Wilfrid Jones. The choristers, who were drawn from the various churches in the district, were accompanied by a full orchestra, led by Mr. Mills, and interesting features of the Festival were harp solos, played by Miss Maggie Davies, and instrumental quartets rendered by members of the orchestra.

Portsmouth.—A very successful Concert was given on the 5th ult., at the Town Hall, on behalf of the South Wales Colliery Disaster Fund, by the Portsmouth Choral Union, numbering, with band and chorus, 300 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. W. E. Green. The programme consisted of an admirable selection of part-songs, glees, selections by the band, and songs by Miss Lina Carr, Madame San Carlo, Mr. W. Guard, and Mr. W. P. Richards, whose performances were enthusiastically received by the large audience present.

Southampton.—Some excellent music has been discoursed on the Pier during the last month. The performances by the Town Band on Sunday evenings have been greatly appreciated. Mr. J. R. Birmingham has successfully conducted the string and military bands of the Cameronians; the band from the training ship "Mercury," under the direction of Mr. J. J. McGavin, has also assisted, and Mr. Edward Jones engaged for his Concert Miss N. Hawkesworth and Mr. S. Kendall as vocalists.

Southwold.—Mr. E. H. Thorne has given some attractive Recitals here. Assisted by Miss Winifred and Mr. Percy Read, who contributed vocal solos, he gave, on the 5th and 11th ult. respectively, two admirable Organ Recitals in the Church of St. Edmund's, and greatly contributed, by his pianoforte playing, to the success of a Concert given in the Drill Hall in aid of the National School Building Fund. At the Concert, Miss Ada Scrivener, Miss Grace Woods, and the Rev. M. Knowles sang, in addition to the above-mentioned vocalists.

Swansea.—The following were the prize-winners at the recent Eisteddfod held in the Albert Hall. Vocalists—Miss Perry, Miss A. Thomas, Mr. Morris, Mr. W. T. Rees, Mr. T. Griffiths, the Ogmore male-voice party (conducted by Mr. W. M. Davies), and the Babell Choir. The prize for the best drum and fife band was gained by the Brwydran Temperance Band, under the conductorship of Mr. H. P. Walters.

Treorky.—Prizes were awarded at the recent Eisteddfod to the following musical competitors: Tenor—1st, Eos Cynfyg; 2nd, Gwilym Taf. Pianoforte Solo—1st, Miss Mary Williams; 2nd, Miss May Griffiths; 3rd, Miss Mary Davies. Drum and Fife Band Competition—1st, Blodeuyn y Duffryn Rechabite; 2nd, Cymmer. Duet, "Y Morwyr"—Prize £2 2s., divided between Gwilym Taf and Jenkyn Rees, and Owen Treharne and John Devonald. Soprano song, "The Holy City"—1st, Mrs. Stephens; 2nd, Miss M. A. Hughes. Chief Choral Competition, "The many rend the skies" (Handel)—Prize, £80, and a gold medal to the Conductor—Mountain Ash Choral Union, conductor, J. James. Tenor solo—Mr. David Lloyd. Baritone solo—Mr. John Thomas was declared the winner of the first prize and Mr. David Jones the second prize.

Victoria, Australia.—The annual report and balance sheet of the Musical Society shows the Association to be in a flourishing condition. During the last half-year two new examinations, respectively called Elementary and Intermediate, have been instituted and are expected to exercise a beneficial influence upon young musicians. Some excellent performances may be expected by this Society in the forthcoming season.

Wellingborough.—At an adjourned meeting held in the Corn Exchange, on the 3rd ult., the final arrangements for the establishment of the new Wellingborough and District Orchestral Society were made. Mr. C. Y. K. Woolston was elected President, with Messrs. E. Noble, J. Heygate, W. Lewin, D. Dudley, and W. Brown as Vice-Presidents; Mr. D. D. Chisholm accepted the office of Treasurer, Mr. G. J. Cox that of Librarian, and Mr Maurice Child was chosen for the important post of Conductor.

Wellington, New Zealand.—A very successful Recital was given, on July 19, in St. Peter's Church, the music being entirely selected from the works of Gounod. The programme included the Prologue and the solo and chorus "From Thy love as a Father," from "The Redemption," the solos in these and other pieces being sung by Miss Stanford, Mrs. Mackintosh, Mr. Clothier, Mr. Mabin, and Mr. Pollock, with Mr. T. T. Trimnell presiding at the organ.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. W. H. Bellamy, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Leamington Spa.—Mr. W. FOURTH EDITION.

KING ARTHUR

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

FOR

THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

JAMES SMIETON, M.A.

MUSIC BY

OLD NOTATION, 2s. 6d.; TONIC SOL-FA, 1s.

Full Score and Band Parts on hire. String Parts for sale at 16s.

The attention of Conductors is specially directed to the above Cantata, as affording an unusually interesting work for Chorus and Soloists. It takes about an hour and forty minutes to perform, and has been given with conspicuous success by the Choral Unions of Dundee, Broughty Ferry, Airdrie, Peebles, Helensburgh, and Hamilton, as well as performances by Miss Holland's Choir (2), Byfield (2), Uckfield, Wakefield, Brondesbury, Glasgow Academy Choir, Glasgow E. Choral Society, Newcastle, Montrose, Stirling, Ayr, Kineton, Arbroath, Selhurst, Chichester, Reading, &c., Choral Societies.

SCOTSMAN.

This beautiful work will enhance the reputation won for its composer by his similar composition, "Ariadne." It shows a charming gift of melody and no small musicianly skill in its merely technical qualities. It may be recommended to Choral Societies as well worthy of study.

MUSICAL TIMES (June 1, 1892).

Mr. John More Smieton's dramatic Cantata "King Arthur" was the pièce de resistance at the annual concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir on April 29. A better choice could hardly have been made, inasmuch as the work has been laid out on lines which cannot fail to prove popular amongst the numerous choral societies ever on the alert for novelty. Mr. James Smieton's admirably written libretto has, indeed, afforded opportunity for effective musical treatment, which is not only graceful and melodious, but eminently graphic in its descriptive power, the work, in short, of a craftsman who is steadily making progress amongst contemporary composers.

DUNDEE EVENING TELEGRAPH (March 30, 1892).

"King Arthur" is called by the composer a cantata, but the name hardly conveys to the mind an idea of the elaborate, lengthy, and powerful character of the work. It is rather a musical epic, and is characterised throughout by a scholarly knowledge of harmony, by a variety and richness of effect, and notably by a melodiousness throughout that are really remarkable. One notable feature which must be mentioned is the effective character of Mr. Smieton's recitatives. The beautiful hymn "There is a land" was a much relished item near the close of the cantata, which ended with a powerful chorus, in which the composer calls up all the resources before him to make a telling and impressive finish to the work.

GLASGOW HERALD (November 30, 1892).

The Eastern Choral Sociey gave a concert last night in the City Hall. The work chosen for performance was Mr. John More Smieton's "King Arthur." Mr. Smieton has set music to his brother's libretto with very happy results, and the work contains many delightful choruses and solos. Miss Annie Lea was the soprano soloist, impersonating Guinevere; Mr. Probert, the tenor (Arthur); Mr. J. W. Render took the music allotted to Merlin and Sir Bedevere. Mr. Cole's orchestra furnished an excellent accompaniment. . . . The choir consisted of about 150 voices, and Mr. George Taggart, the conductor, may be congratulated on having trained them to a high state of efficiency.

Specially adapted for small Choral Societies, Church Choirs, &c.—4th Edition.

ORATORIOS

GEO. SHINN, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

SUITABLE FOR CONCERT-ROOM OR CHURCH.

The following Works contain many effective Solos and Choruses of moderate difficulty, and will take about an hour and a half in performance.

Twelfth Thousand.

THE CAPTIVES OF BABYLON.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"In our judgment no better work of the kind has yet been published. It is brimful of pretty melodies, and the harmonic effects show the skill of a painstaking and talented musician."—Free Methodist.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. . . . Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers."—United Service Gazette.

LAZARUS OF BETHANY.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn has the happy knack of writing popular music which is at the same time thoroughly good, and free from serious difficulties. This his latest work will find acceptance amongst choral societies and church choirs. The choruses are bold and effective. The solos are melodious, and suited to the words. The quartet, 'Blessed are the dead,' is really charming."—Nonconformist Musical Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but withal melodious and musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

"The work contains some remarkably well-written solos and choruses. There are two exquisite bass solos, and a quartet, 'Blessed are the dead,' is a lovely piece of part-writing. The concluding fugue, 'Hallelujah, Amen,' is a fitting climax to the work."—Sussex Daily News.

(STABAT MATER SPECIOSA)

A CANTICLE FOR CHRISTMAS

WORDS TRANSLATED FROM GIACOPONE (13th Century) BY REV. DR. NEALE

MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE,

D.Mus.

THIS WORK OCCUPIES ABOUT HALF-AN-HOUR IN PERFORMANCE, AND COMPRISES SOLOS FOR SOPRANO AND BARITONE AND FOUR CHORUSES, ONE OF WHICH IS A CAROL.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Giacopone's beautiful companion sequence to his more famous hymn on the Passion has suggested the composition of a short cantata which will be a most welcome addition to Christmas music. . . . In his new work Dr. Bridge has confirmed the impression made by his beautiful setting of the Hymn 'Rock of Ages'—that he is at his best in music of a devotional class; he has maintained the interest of his work from the first chorus to the last."—Times.

"The beauty and propriety of this music seem complete. In respect of melody and harmony alike all is grace and tenderness, simple and affecting as the subject demands, but made more so by the touches of highly cultivated art. . . . Cannot fail to enchance the composer's reputation. It contains genuine vocal music as well as tasteful and effective orchestration, while scarcely a page lacks winning grace."—Daily Telegraph.

"Cheerful in style, but genuinely effective, is not beyond the means of ordinary choirs."—Daily News.

"Remarkable for lyrical beauty and melodiousness . . . and may be regarded as a valuable addition to our Christmas Festival Church music."—Morning Post.

"More gratification will be derived from 'The Cradle of Christ' than from many longer works, for it is sure to find friends in every quarter."—Daily Chronicle.

"Throughout the whole work . . . Dr. Bridge displays not only sound scholarship but sincere sentiment . . . and the concluding choruses exhibit the composer's power of working up to an effective climax in a decidedly happy light."—Daily Graphic.

"A charming little work, and forms a welcome addition to the plentiful but not overstocked store of Christmas sacred music. A more appropriate setting of the 'Stabat Mater Speciosa,' or one more calculated to satisfy both devotional and artistic requirements, could hardly be conceived."—Sunday Times.

"Distinctly clever and well written, with many of those little touches that only a man well versed in art knows how to give, and is withal an interesting little composition."—Musical Standard.

"Well adapted for church use, and will probably be heard in not a few churches when the Feast of the Nativity comes to be celebrated. . . . The music, whether vocal or instrumental, is thoroughly well adapted for voice or instrument as the case may be, and there are no complexities or other difficulties that need deter a fairly competent choral society or church choir from attempting the work."—Yorkshire Post.

"Notable for its directness and melodious freshness."—Leeds Mercury.

"A musicianly production displaying knowledge kept in due bounds by devotional feeling, and worthy of the notice of enterprising choral societies."—Birmingham Gazette.

"A very fine work, and will no doubt prove useful for choral societies. Dr. Bridge has evidently hit the popular taste in this canticle."—Bristol Times.

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

SUITE FOR ORCHESTRA

BY

Full Score, 5s.; Parts, 15s.

Referring to this work at the last Cheltenham Festival, the Daily Telegraph remarks: "The movements are a Pastorale, a Minuet, Gavotte, and Saraband—the last three 'in olden style'—and a Rondo Scherzoso. Both the first and last are extremely interesting, and have attractions which all can appreciate, but the dance measures are, I fancy, sure to be best received. They are delightful in their quaint, old-world grace. Amateur orchestras should give their attention to Sir Herbert's Suite. It is not beyond their means, and out of it may be got both pleasure and profit."

A SHORT HISTORICAL ACCOUNT

AT

WITH A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF GRADUATES IN THAT FACULTY FROM THE YEAR 1463

BY

C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

The attention which has of late years been given by our Universities to the cultivation of music, and the endeavour to again make the degrees of Doctor and Bachelor in that faculty of substantial value, as marks of real musical erudition and culture on the part of the holder, as was formerly the case, have induced me to try and investigate the early history of these degrees which are peculiar to the English Universities, and are practically unknown abroad.

I have traced the course of the degrees from the earliest time they are mentioned to the present day, when the tendency becomes more and more marked to place music on a level in every respect with the other faculties.

THE TEN VIRGINS

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES AND CHORUS

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

(Op. 42.)

Composer of "The Holy City," "Ruth," "Passion Service," "Joan of Arc," &c.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which every one can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would have their works popular with choral societies, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long-continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced now-a-days is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—'The Messiah,' 'Creation,' and 'Elijah'—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—'The Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'—and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal, Dec. 17, 1890.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' . . . Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader, Dec. 16, 1890.

Bow and Bromley Institute Choir.—"The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. If the verdict of a miscellaneous audience, that could have no possible reason for being favourably prejudiced, is of any account in estimating the merit of a new work, a career that will rival that of the same composer's 'Holy City' may be predicted for 'The Ten Virgins.' That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—Musical Times, Dec. 1, 1890.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

The above Cantata has been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral, including three numbers for Sopranos and Contraltos (The Virgins).

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, 5s. per 100.

JOAN OF ARC

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

ALBUM OF TWENTY-SIX SONGS

(Dedicated to Her Majesty the Queen)

BY

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY.

Paper covers, 5s.; red cloth, 7s. 6d.

Under "Music of the Day" the Daily Telegraph says: "Sir Herbert Oakeley has collected into one volume, and Messrs. Schott and Co. have published, twenty-six songs by the Edinburgh Emeritus Professor. It appears to me, as far as I am acquainted with Sir Herbert's works of this kind, that his best things have been chosen, and admirable things they are—not always spontaneous, it may be, but in such cases making up for the defect by an excess of merit in other directions. Armed with this volume, the British amateur has no reason to shrink from a comparison of his country's lyric music with that of any other. So much strenuous and thoroughly artistic effort as these songs display should not pass without very cordial recognition, which here I give to it."

The Times, referring to the newer songs, mentions: "The poetical setting of 'Now sleeps the crimson petal' and 'Come down, O maid,' two of the most deeply-felt of the author's versions of the lyrics from 'The Princess'; 'Forget thee?' a song that is almost dramatic in treatment, and an appropriately simple setting of 'She dwelt among the untrodden ways.' Some of the imitations of Italian popular songs and one or two of the French lyrics are effective, and the book certainly exhibits a welcome variety in style and character."

The Keynote thus summarises: "After carefully perusing the different numbers it is satisfactory to notice the equality of the work in point of merit. Albums could be mentioned which, perhaps, contain two or more good things, and the others could, without loss to any one, be laid on the shelf; but in this instance the whole twenty-six will repay both amateurs and professional musicians tenfold in the delight that sound English music, when allied to good words, always creates. A feature of the collection is that to every song in it a choice is given of two, sometimes of three, languages. For two most beautiful but recondite songs of Lord Tennyson, 'Tears, idle tears,' and 'Ask me no more,' a 'commentary' of great ability, and admirably explaining the hidden meaning of the late Laureate, has been written by Sir George Grove, and enhances the interest of this album, which has been dedicated to, and a copy accepted by H.M. the Queen."

UNA

FOR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

VERSE BY

FREDERICK ENOCH

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

PERFORMANCE IN THE PUBLIC HALL, IPSWICH, JANUARY 16, 1894.

"'Una' has been so recently described and criticised that there is no necessity for detailed reference to the composition. Roughly speaking, it is founded upon the story of 'Una and the Lion' as told in the 'Faërie Queene,' amplified in verse of unusual excellence by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and full of romantic incident which commends itself to picturesque musical expression . . . possesses in a marked degree the great charms of tunefulness and vivacity. It is above all things an understandable Cantata—not one of those crabbed and crooked things which no ordinary person can understand. The most striking and romantic number is undoubtedly the chorus 'Hark! the Angelus is calling,' in which the campanels used at Norwich (manufactured by Messrs. Martineau and Smith, of Birmingham) were introduced. It is free and comparatively simple in style, but full of poetic melody, recalling by a flash of association that famous and familiar picture of 'The Angelus.' This was admirably given, and the choruses throughout, indeed, 'went' with great spirit and precision, reflecting much credit upon those engaged, and upon Mr. Dalby's efforts as leader in preparing for the Concert. The swinging chorus, 'Let's hasten on,' was loudly encored. A similar compliment was paid to all four soloists for their best efforts—to Mr. Henry Piercy for the song, 'Shine, vestal star'; to Miss Croft for the taking solo, 'The enchanter's wand,' which should become a popular excerpt; to Miss Rose Long, who did full and sympathetic justice to the charming song, 'O love will love,' and to Mr. Daniel Price for his rendering of 'A Palmer, met upon my way.' At the close, the performance as a whole was loudly applauded by the well-pleased audience. The composer himself conducted, and was most heartily welcomed as he came to the front of the platform."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added, for the flow of pleasant unaffected tune and the simple and suave part-writing are just as noteworthy as in 'The Holy City' and 'Joan of Arc.'"—Athenæum.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"'Una' differs considerably from some of the earlier works of Mr. Gaul. Mr. Frederick Enoch is the capable librettist, and in setting his words to music, Mr. Gaul has scored another marked success."—Nelson Chronicle.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody. The soprano solo, 'O love will love,' is really a delicious piece of writing."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"Is in keeping with Mr. Gaul's previous works. . . . Contains some beautiful numbers, especially the Angelus chorus, with the campanel introduction."—South-Western World.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.—Music by John E. Campbell, composer of the popular Kyrie in E flat. Price 2d.
London: Weekes and Co., 14, Hanover Street, W.

PRODUCED AT THE HEREFORD FESTIVAL.

SIR OGIE AND THE LADY ELSIE

BALLAD

FOR SOPRANO AND BARITONE SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

The English Version by F. York Powell

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

C. HARFORD LLOYD.

Vocal Score, 8vo, paper cover, 1s. 6d.
Full Score and Orchestral Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

The composer has founded his work on several charming and appropriate themes of distinctly "ballad character," and has treated them with great skill and effect. . . . The little work is modestly scored, but with skill and distinction, and the hearty cheering with which the composer was greeted at its close was well deserved.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In setting music to this ballad Dr. Lloyd has shown sound judgment. He has written what for distinction's sake may be called narrative music, aiding, rather than hindering, the progress and effect of the story, and having throughout a pleasant flavour of the old ballad tunes. Here and there something more than a flavour of national airs may be noticed; but of this no one will complain. The composer has acted wisely, moreover, in using few themes, and in so making these recur as to secure an impression of musical unity. For reasons easily guessed, the work is not one which demands large discussion; but it is clever, and, as regards the music, at any rate pleasant to hear.

STANDARD.

Dr. Lloyd's work is mainly formed on two melodies, both having the character of traditional tunes, though not identical with any that I can call to mind. The first is presented chiefly in G, minor and major curiously alternating, six-eight and nine-eight measure; and the second is a winning and tender strain running through the duet between the damsel and her spectral visitor, easily written for voices and orchestra, and yet displaying considerable musical taste. The first novelty of the Festival made a highly favourable impression.

DAILY NEWS.

The general style more or less resembles that of the choral ballads of Professor Stanford and others, save that the words of the Ghost and his lady are given to Mr. Plunket Greene and Miss Jessie King, the chorus of course playing the part of narrators. . . . The Ghost's music, with some realistic touches from the orchestra at cock-crow, is excellent. There is a capital duet for the two former lovers, and the part-writing for the chorus is comparatively simple, but effective. In short, if objection to the gruesomeness of the subject be waived, this work deserves to become popular with choirs, and its success this evening, when it was conducted by Dr. Lloyd in person, was beyond dispute.

MORNING POST.

There is much that is enjoyable in Dr. Lloyd's music. It is based upon two extremely melodious and effective themes, the second of which might well be an original West-country folk-song, and both are treated with the skill and resource pertaining to the accomplished musician. From this cause and its melodiousness the work will doubtless find favour with many amateur choral societies.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Dr. Lloyd's work, which may best be described as of elegant simplicity, is laid out for baritone and mezzo-soprano solos, the narrative portions being assigned to the chorus, and the accompaniment lightly scored for orchestra. Unambitious, though symmetrical in design, Dr. Lloyd's little work is at once scholarly, well-knit, and melodious. The performance, which was conducted by the composer, was happily calculated to set forth the merits of the ballad in a most favourable light.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

Dr. Lloyd's music is melodious and bears a resemblance to Old English folk-songs as regards the melodies.

GLOBE.

Dr. Harford Lloyd's "Sir Ogie and the Lady Elsie," spite of its cadaverous subject, proved graceful, genial, and melodious, and is marked by the elegant symmetry of design invariably to be found in Dr. Lloyd's compositions.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S WORKS.

5TH AND 6TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

"Mr. Gaul's latest work is another proof of his practical wisdom as well as of his ability as a composer. We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra, with Mr. A. J. Eyre as organist. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"The part-writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout. There is sufficient variety to prevent any feeling of monotony. . . . At its close the composer was heartily cheered."—Daily News.

"Without being unduly difficult, it is indisputably effective."—London Figaro.

"At the close of the work, portions of which were loudly applauded, Mr. Gaul, who conducted, was warmly complimented on a Cantata which is likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City' and others of his compositions."—Daily Chronicle.

"Characterised by the same refinement as that of Mr. Gaul's extremely successful work 'The Holy City.'"—The Athenæum.

"We may say at once that the music is characterised by Mr. Gaul's usual felicity of treatment. Mr. Gaul had every reason to be gratified with the performance and reception of his Cantata, and he may expect to hear of many more performances."—Musical Times.

"Musicianly and excellent, and not too difficult to imperil its popularity."—Musical Opinion.

"One of the most musicianly, melodious, and well conceived works of its popular composer."—School Music Review.

"More than a passing word of praise is due to Miss Lillie Wormald. Her execution of David's 'Couplets du Mysoli' was excellent, the light, graceful French characteristics of the air being admirably caught and expressed."—Manchester Courier, February 1, 1894.

OPENING OF THE LEEDS COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—"The sympathies of the audience had been fully drawn upon by the singing of Miss Lillie Wormald, a young lady whom we do not remember to have heard before, but who is evidently destined to make a considerable reputation for herself. Her voice, a light soprano of highly agreeable quality, has been manifestly cultivated in a good school. Her cultured style and accuracy of intonation were especially noticeable in David's 'Couplets du Mysoli,' the rendering of which fully merited the designation of 'charming' applied to it by Sir Joseph Barnby. Nor did the piquant extract 'Mia Piccirella,' from Gomes's 'Salvator Rosa,' lack any contributory element of success."—Leeds Mercury, June 19, 1894.

"Miss Lillie Wormald contributed several songs in a clever and highly appreciated manner."—Yorkshire Post, June 21, 1894.

(The Australian popular Baritone)

Having returned to England after a long and successful career, is now booking Engagements for Miscellaneous and Oratorio Concerts.

"Mr. Tom Burgin, who sang Ciro Pinsuti's 'I fear no foe,' is one of the finest baritones ever heard in this city. His voice is full and perfectly under command, and the way in which he rang out the defiant tones of his song last night was something to be remembered."—Melbourne Argus.

"In the soul-stirring song, 'The Bay of Biscay,' he was most vociferously encored, and, in spite of two recalls, he was compelled to repeat the last verse, which gave unlimited satisfaction to the audience."—Sydney Morning Herald.

"Mr. T. Burgin has in his voice and manner the conditions of success, and only needs to be known to be appreciated in this wider artistically, but, geographically narrower, tight little island. His songs were well chosen to display his varied powers, his first appearance being made in an Australian song, 'Imperfectus,' by Sir W. C. F. Robinson, Governor of Western Australia. This proved a most interesting composition and was enthusiastically received."—Northern Echo.

"In Mr. T. Burgin Mons. Speelman has found a really splendid baritone, and Mons. Speelman was so delighted with Mr. Burgin's singing that he shook hands with him on the stage in a complimentary manner. Mr. Burgin has met with all the success he merited, and his next appearance will be anxiously awaited for."—Blackpool Times.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

STRAUSS AND HIS INFLUENCE.

"And then there is Strauss conducting his fine orchestra; and when the new waltzes he writes expressly for each fashionable ball turn out successfully, the dancers stop to applaud him, the ladies approach the platform and throw him bouquets, and he is recalled at the end of the quadrilles. Thus there is no jealousy between dancing and music; each shares with the other in its pleasure and success. This is only fair, for Strauss is an artist. The influence he has already exercised over musical feeling throughout Europe in introducing cross rhythms into waltzes is not sufficiently appreciated. So piquant is the effect that the dancers themselves have already sought to imitate it by creating the deux-temps waltz, although the music itself has kept the triple rhythm. If, out of Germany, the public at large can be induced to understand the singular charm frequently resulting from the opposition and super-position of contrary rhythms, it will be owing to Strauss. Beethoven's marvels in this style are too far above them, and act only upon exceptional audiences; Strauss has addressed himself to the masses, and his numerous imitators have been forced, whilst imitating, to second his efforts." Thus wrote Berlioz just fifty years ago, and although the subject of his remarks was Johann Strauss the elder, they are applicable in every particular to his son and successor in the realm of waltz-land, whose jubilee has just been celebrated with such remarkable enthusiasm in Vienna. It is prefectly true, as the late Lord Bowen remarked in one of his luminous addresses, that in these days of hasty and undiscriminating criticism, we are over prone to erect memorials to nobodies, and elaborately celebrate the centenary of nothing. And hence we can imagine the distrust and suspicion with which a certain number of earnest and serious-minded musicians must look upon all the fuss that has been made of late over a writer of popular dance tunes simply because, fifty years from the date of his début as a conductor, he is still in the land of the living. Well, we have quoted what Berlioz said of the father, and now we may supplement it with what a greater than Berlioz said of the son. "A single Strauss waltz," wrote Wagner, "surpasses in grace, refinement, and real musical substance most of the products of foreign manufacture which we often import at such great cost." Or perhaps our austere critics are devotees of Brahms. Very well, then, it may reassure them to know that not only is Brahms a personal friend of Strauss, but that his favourite recreation in Vienna is to listen to Strauss's band, and that when asked to contribute to Madame Strauss's autograph fan, he wrote a few bars of the "Blue Danube" waltz, adding the charming compliment: "Unfortunately, not by me—Johannes Brahms." As for Hans von Bülow, he recorded his admiration for the music of Strauss not long before his death in very precise and memorable terms, when he publicly advocated the inclusion of his waltzes from time to time in the programmes of symphonic concerts. Such testimonies as the foregoing might be indefinitely multiplied, for all the really great musicians of the day are unanimous in their appreciation of Strauss's music. It is only the prigs and the pedants of the musical world who affect to despise his achievements on the ground of its triviality and gaiety. The Horatian maxim, dulce est desipere in loco, has no attractions to such as these; in music, as elsewhere, they would fain establish an unending reign of earnestness. To them we could commend the consideration of the interesting fact that it was none other than Johann Strauss who introduced fragments of "Lohengrin" for the first time to the Viennese public, and that similarly excerpts from the "Meistersinger" were also given for the first time in the Austrian capital under his direction.

The influence that Strauss has exerted upon his musical contemporaries is sufficiently attested by the marked predilection shown by some of the most eminent composers of the day —Brahms and Dvorák in particular—for what may be called the symphonic treatment of the waltz rhythm, a very beautiful specimen of which may be found in Dvorák's Symphony in G (No. 4). Outside the ranks of the musical profession it would perhaps be not too much to say that Strauss has been the most universally popular composer of the century, and that the tune of the "Blue Danube" is the least threadbare melody that ever attained to a barrel-organ popularity. And yet, to comprehend fully the remarkable demonstrations of which Strauss has recently been the object, it should not be overlooked, as a writer in the Ménestrel very justly points out, that Strauss's compositions have a political interest, almost on a par with their intrinsic or artistic merit. "The regrettable and continual dissensions between the various races which make up the Austrian Empire have had the result of creating a sort of Viennese nationality, a Viennese patriotism; a parallel for which cannot be found in any other European capital. The genuine Viennese is a Viennese first, a German of Austria second. Anything, therefore, that can accentuate the Viennese ideal of life is dear to him, and for this reason Strauss's music enjoys an hereditary popularity. The name and genius of his father, no doubt, counted for a good deal in Johann Strauss's earliest successes, but to him Vienna owes the final consummation of her national dance, the waltz. More than that, he created the Viennese operetta at an epoch when Offenbach, a Parisianised son of the Rhine, seemed to have monopolised the exclusive possession of this field; and, finally—a far prouder distinction in the eyes of the Viennese—he wrote that national anthem of Vienna, that delightful set of waltzes called "The Beautiful Blue Danube," which became in every country the "Marseillaise" of the sheer joy of living, just as Rouget de l'Isle's patriotic song is everywhere recognised as the symbol of political enfranchisement." In this connection we may relate the curious story of an Austrian lady of fashion, who begged, when on her death-bed, that Strauss might play one of his waltzes at her funeral. Her wish, so the story goes, was granted, and the waltz, which she specially chose, was played as the coffin was being lowered into the grave. Berlioz, it is worth mentioning, states in his memoirs, àpropos of his visit to Vienna, that Strauss's waltzes, the airs in which he compares to "fervid love voices," excited in him an intense melancholy. But Berlioz was a man of an exceptional and, in some respects, morbidly sensitive organisation. Strauss's chief title to grateful remembrance is that he has, in the fullest sense of the word, contributed to the gaiety of nations. In face of the achievements of such a common benefactor of humanity, whose race is writ large in his name and physiognomy, we can imagine that even the most rabid anti-Semite must feel a temporary abatement of his ignoble and un-Christian animosity.

MUSIC AT THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

We have much pleasure in printing, for the benefit of our readers, the instructive, edifying, and (it may be added) entertaining paper on "Music considered in its effect upon, and connection with, the Worship of the Church," read last month by Sir John Stainer, at the Church Congress at Exeter. Profound knowledge, wide experience, catholicity of spirit, unrestricted sympathy, wholesome humour combine to give this paper a character too seldom attaching to utterances on ecclesiastical subjects:—

The art of music has various functions in its relation to worship. In its simplest form it is nothing more than an orderly and dignified method of reading or saying; it rises higher and higher, till it becomes the perfected work of art; it then embodies and expresses the thoughts and aspirations of the composer; and thus it next becomes a teacher, a very forcible teacher, of those who know how to hear aright, owing to its remarkable power of pictorial and emotional narration. Lastly, music in worship should be regarded as a "thing of beauty" presented as a free offering to the eternal Source and Fount of all that is beautiful.

It is evident that in some respects music stands on much the same footing as any other arts which are accessories of worship. In architecture, sculpture, and painting we find that thought can be expressed, lessons taught, and an offering of the beautiful can be made to God. But in one important characteristic music will be found to stand on a totally different footing to other fine arts. The painting once finished, the church once built, or, when the last touch has been given to the sculptured stone or carved wood, we have before us an outward manifestation, a permanent embodiment, of the artist's conceptions and feelings. Not so in music! The finished composition is absolutely nothing more than a written description of what a composer wishes to have done, and a series of directions how to do it. He has written an account of the tone-picture formed in his mind, but it has to be painted by others, and at every reproduction it has to be repainted. Music being thus so thoroughly dependent on its interpreters for its presentation, it follows naturally that the more advanced a composition is as a work of art, the more does it stand in need of trained and expert performers.

Hence, there has gradually arisen a well-marked distinction between Church music which can only be rendered by experts, and such simple forms of music as plain-song, chants, and hymns, which may safely be entrusted to a congregation for their rendering. Here we find the origin of the demarcation of choir and people, of congregational as distinguished from choral music (i.e., choir music).

The Reformation did not in the least check the production of works of higher sacred musical art; we possess, as you know, a comprehensive and chronologically continuous literature of Church compositions by English composers, of which we may well be proud.

But, on the other hand, though not interfering or obstructing the output of the higher class of Church compositions, the Reformation unquestionably exhibited a tendency to throw a larger share of worship-music into the hands of the congregation than before, and I suppose no one will gainsay the statement that this tendency has been steadily on the increase.

But, surely, there is plenty of room for the existence of both classes of music within our Church; is there any reason whatever why they should be antagonistic, or mutually destructive? The higher form of the art has found its natural home in our cathedrals, in the college chapels of our Universities, and in our Royal chapels; right well has the art thriven in these national nurseries of sacred music, and I venture to say its best traditions have been nobly maintained to this very day. On the other hand, our parish churches, spread like a beautiful network over the length and breadth of our land, have provided, or should have provided, the true home of simple congregational music, and their service might have afforded ample scope for its preservation and growth.

With separate paths so clearly defined, it would seem at first sight almost impossible for any question to arise as to the plain duty of the parish church or the cathedral in the matter of music.

But a rather unexpected turn of events has apparently landed us in a difficulty. It is this:

The great Church revival of fifty years ago made its influence felt on Church music as on every other art used in worship. Parochial congregations found themselves encouraged to join in the plain-song of responses; they were provided with Gregorian psalters, and from the surpliced choir they soon learnt the Gregorian chants; more comprehensive hymnals were placed in their hands, and their worship generally was imbued with more heartiness. But the forward movement did not stop here. Urged by a desire to make the public services as ornate and beautiful as possible, anthems and elaborate canticles were rapidly introduced into many parish churches, and also artistic settings (English or foreign) of the Nicene Creed, Sanctus, and Gloria in Excelsis; in short, in many churches, especially in those where some little antipathy was felt towards the archaisms of Gregorian music, a cathedral form of service, pure and simple, was adopted.

The musical result was exactly what might have been anticipated. Fine choral services could be heard in many churches in large towns where the resources, musical and pecuniary, happened to be ample. But in rural and other less favoured districts the half-trained or wholly untrained choirs persistently attempted to perform compositions utterly above their powers, until, in a large number of churches, our clergy became at last so constantly annoyed, and their congregations so thoroughly bored, at the hopeless failures and the actual cacophony of these over-ambitious choirs, that a reaction set in, and no wonder. There now rises from many a parish a strong demand for simple congregational music.

If the sole reason given for ejecting elaborate music from our parishes happened to be that their musical resources were not sufficient to ensure a really good choir, and that, consequently, the performances were bad, I should entirely sympathise with the demand; of course, all music which cannot be well rendered in our Church services should not be attempted at all. But the reasons given for this overthrow of the choir, which I hear from many quarters, are these: first, if a choir sings anything in which the people cannot join, the people are being defrauded of a right; next, the only plea for allowing a choir to sing an anthem or other choral piece is, that they cannot be kept together unless indulged in occasional opportunities of showing themselves off.

Against both these statements I strongly protest. I have quite failed to discover any artistic, historical, or ecclesiastical grounds for this sort of universal claim to hum or howl in any portion of our Church services, and I can give personal testimony to the mischief caused by this so-called privilege. I have frequently, within the last few years, had congregational singers near me who have not only entirely disturbed my own worship, but that of everybody within a radius of five yards, sometimes by singing every melody at the interval of a third or sixth below, on one occasion by singing uniformly a perfect fifth below the trebles, and always at the top of their voices; but perhaps my greatest infliction was to have a man just behind me who, I cannot say sang, but produced the melody of everything two octaves below the trebles in a bee-in-a-bottle sort of tone, which, heard anywhere but in church, would have been a piece of inimitable comicality. To silence such a man would be, I am told, to defraud him of a rightful privilege. For my part, I should say the only privilege such a man would be deprived of, were he silenced, would be the privilege of being hauled up before a magistrate for brawling in church.

Ought not such persons to be told that the most pious and cultured men and women have, for well nigh a score of centuries, been sedulously trying to discover by what means new beauty could be added to the place, the manner, the surroundings of Divine worship? Why should it be supposed that bad singing is good enough for church use? It may be urged that the efficacy of an offering to God does not depend upon its artistic merit or money value, but on the motive and spirit of the offerer. May I ask whether we accept this principle consistently? If the adult members of a congregation were to present themselves to their minister, carrying various pots of paint, and were to ask to be allowed to decorate the church, would he permit them to bedaub the fabric because their motive was so commendable? If men or women wish to join in the singing in our churches, they should at least take some little trouble to cultivate their voices and to learn the music. After this, their musical offering, however poor and weak, at all events would have cost them something—namely, a little trouble. I think unmusical people ought to realize the fact that their untrained attempts at singing stand on no higher level than a child's first attempt to sketch a horse or paint a cow. I am behind no one in my admiration of good congregational singing—its effect is noble and inspiriting; but, surely, congregations should be distinctly told in what musical portions of worship they may join, and in what portions they should meditate in silence.

The conclusion I arrive at is this: That congregational rehearsals on a week-day evening should be encouraged as much as possible in our parishes. After a few prayers or a short form of service, all the portions of the service in which the congregation can legitimately join should be carefully practised. Such a system would, in course of time, practically turn our congregations into vast amateur choirs, and then the music of the people would be an offering not quite so unworthy of Him to whom it is offered.

Under such circumstances, it may be said a choir might well be dispensed with; at most, all that would be necessary in our parish churches would be a few trained voices for the purpose of "leading" the people. To this I reply, certainly not; by no means give up your choir. There is only one valid excuse for not having a choir, and that is, inability to pay for it. If anyone should ask me what is the use of a choir when a congregation knows how to take its part in worship, I should ask in return, what is the use of those mullions, and that delicate tracery, and richly coloured stained glass? Away with it all! Good plate-glass in strong wooden sashes will admit twice as much light in winter, and give plenty of wholesome ventilation in summer. If we are to approach sacred art from a purely utilitarian point of view, what is the use of a tower or spire? You cannot have a vestry or an organ up there, or hold a mother's meeting in it. Ah, but I forgot, as the anthem only exists in order that the choir may "show off," so, perhaps, the spire is a sort of architect's anthem—perhaps church architects can not be "kept together" unless indulged with an occasional spire; it is, no doubt, merely thrown into the plans lest architects should desert church work, and devote their best powers to the construction of municipal buildings and music halls.

I am sure it is unnecessary for me to argue further against the utilitarian view of art in worship; and I may at once say that the function of a trained choir is to sing many beautiful compositions which can never be rendered by the most musical of congregations. An anthem rightly listened to, and devoutly sung, is a short sermon to the hearers and a beautiful offering to God. At those congregational rehearsals which I have just advocated, why should not one of the clergy deliver a short address on the words of the anthem which it is proposed to sing on the following Sunday? The line of thought suitable to them might thus be impressed on the congregation, and the framework of a meditation be sketched out; we should then perhaps no longer see people staring about the church, or settling themselves into a comfortable sitting posture during the anthem, as if it were a horrid tax on their patience; and I sincerely hope we never again should hear it even hinted that an anthem is nothing more than a sop tossed to the members of the choir to appease their insatiable vanity. The anthem in its present form seems to be the peculiar and special growth of our English Church, and therefore deserves cultivation and encouragement. When we come to the music of the office of Holy Communion, we immediately are led to realize the catholicity of our art of music. If the inflections of the priest's part be included, or the melodies of ancient hymns, our range of selection extends over a thousand years at least. If certain celebrations are set aside for those who do not like music, surely there should be other celebrations beautified with the highest and most splendid resources of our heaven-born art. Every great musician, almost without exception, has contributed the choicest fruits of his genius to the music of the Eucharist. Let us not wantonly cast aside this glorious heritage, borne along on the gathering crest of rolling ages, because, forsooth, John Noakes and Tom Styles cannot take their personal part in the performance of it.

There is one form of worship which our English Church has made thoroughly its own—I mean the special service, with its cantata, Passion music, or oratorio appropriate to the Church's seasons. Here, again, a short course of lectures from the clergy on the meaning of the words and the characteristics of the music would be invaluable for the purpose of making a congregation fully realise the privilege of listening to Church music. Concert-goers find annotated programmes awaiting them; why should Church-goers be deprived of all information as to what they are going to hear? It is, I think, in these days the duty of all of us, especially of the clergy, to make congregations understand the spiritual benefit, the real edification of listening to music, and of meditating in silence. What a great teacher is this silence! Is it not the most searching introspector of the soul, tearing down sham pretexts and exposing real motives? But silence can do more than probe us to the quick; it can lend us wings to soar above earthly things; it can help us to mount higher and higher on the rising waves of sacred song, until we feel lost in a foretaste of that future home where angelic music will more adequately hymn the praises of Divine love.

The Possible Future Adoption of an Authorised Hymnal.

Under this title Canon Twells read an interesting paper. He deprecates, we observe, anything of the nature of an enforced uniformity, imposed upon the Church by authority, but contemplates the issue of a Hymnal, "drawn up under the superintendence of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, for the use of those who are willing to accept it, either from a wish for proper guidance, or from a conviction of its merits."

There is a clear recognition here, we are glad to notice, of the liberty which has made, and keeps, the Church of England what she is—a Church, wide, comprehensive, and tolerant, not a sect, by nature narrow and exclusive. What is most to be feared is the production of a book which reflects only the predominant theological opinion of the day, wanting in true catholicity and comprehensiveness. If the proper definition of a hymn be that given by Dr. Julian, "sanctified thought and feeling woven into song for the instruction and edification of the people of God," there is indeed much to be desired in the existing hymn-books which have attained the greatest popularity. Hymns, so-called, are often dry, bald, dogmatic statements done into rhyme, oftener mere vapid prettinesses, catching to the precisian and the effeminate, but lamentably wanting in saintly tone, manly thought, depth of Christian feeling, nervous expression, poetical character, power to instruct and edify. "Let our hymns reflect our Book of Common Prayer," urges Canon Twells, "every jot and tittle of it." That is exactly what one would look for in a Church of England Hymnal, that it should reflect the Book of Common Prayer in its teaching and its spirit. But such a demand does not imply that it should be restricted in such matters as the sources from which the hymns are taken, forms of expression, kinds of metre, and such-like. The Church of England, as a living branch of the Church Catholic, has wisely welcomed and assimilated hymns in infinite variety; not always, indeed, with sufficient respect to the canons of good taste and the designs of authors; although possibly, as has been pointed out, improvement herein might accompany the compilation of an authorised Hymnal. A Liturgy and a Hymnal, it appears to us, do not stand on the same footing. Prayers, Lessons out of Holy Scripture, the Order of Service, and so forth, may be constant and undeviating, without disadvantage, nay, with manifest advantage to the worshipper; but the poet—and a competent hymn-writer must have the gifts and conceptions of a poet—should not be bound in like manner. From generation to generation men arise, embodying in sacred song old stable truths, but in new phrases, fresh combinations, with original persuasiveness. And the familiar has a tendency to become outworn. As a witness to such a feeling, we may cite the reiterated emendations, not ended even yet, of a Hymnal so widely used as Hymns Ancient and Modern. The experiment of an authorised Hymnal, with the prestige which will naturally attach to it, is full of risk, lest thereby the selection of hymns should become rigidly stereotyped, and the stream of hymn and tune-writing be dammed up. "One hymn, one tune" is as mischievous and misleading as such jingles usually are, and if there is, henceforward, no chance for new hymns and new tunes to be heard and adopted, will they not cease to be written? And soon the "Authorised Hymnal" will become obsolete, left behind by the vitality and energy that refuses to be coerced. And if a revision be called for and attempted, will not the book be thrown into the crucible from time to time, to emerge in what new shape? The difficulty, however, we take it, would be not to revise wisely so much as to get revision assented to, so strong is the adherence to what holds the ground. On the whole, we think the question of having an authorised Hymnal needs much more prolonged and thorough discussion. There may be—perhaps it ought to be admitted that there are—drawbacks and disadvantages in the present system of liberty of choice, but are we quite sure that, in the endeavour to escape from one set of evils, we shall not be forging for ourselves evils much more burdensome and binding?

FROM MY STUDY.

The portrait of Liszt as a young man, now reproduced, is a proof on India paper. It was drawn from the life by N. Hanhart, and published (undated) by Wessel and Co., 67, Frith Street. On the lower margin these lines appear:

> Expression, Mind and Majesty are there,
> But where's the wonder-working hand—say where
> The hand that sways our feelings at its will?
> Not Nature's self could equal Nature's own,
> And Art, despairing, lays her pencil down,
> Nor dares a task too arduous for her skill.

In the album containing my proof is a four-

> Spirto gentil, cui nell' eterna mente
> Della più bella idea produsse Amore,
> Esempio vivo di virtù, d' onore,
> E di vera pietà specchio lucente,
> Io credo ben, ch' in te l 'Onnipossente
> Spirì più ch' in alte' uom del suo valore,
> E di quell' armonia t' inondi il core,
> Che poi sempre sonar dentro si sente;
> Ed ei ti die' quella divina cetra
> Al cui suon si dilegua agnoscia e duclo,
> Ch' ogni cuor duro intenerisce e spetra
> Affinchè per te sol da questa inferno,
> Dell' armonio su l' ali alzata a volo,
> L' alma si lievi al suo principio eterno.

"Jeune inspiré, que l'amour divin forma de la plus belle de pensées qui de toute éternité reposait dans son sein; rare et vivant modèle de toutes les vertus; vrai miroir de piété filiale.

"Certes, je vois que la Tout-Puissant t'ouvrit plus qu'à tout autre mortel les trésors de ses faveurs, et placa lui-même dans ton cœur cette ineffable harmonie que l'on sent encore retentir dans l'âme long-tems apres que tes accords ont cessé;

"Lui-même te donna cette divine lyre au son de laquelle s'endorment toutes les douleurs, et s'attendrissent les cœurs les plus durs et les plus rebelles.

"Divin enchantement! qui peu á peu détache l'âme de cet triste et obscure vallée qui on nomme la vie, et, sur les ailes de l'harmonie, lui fait prendre l'essor vers sa celeste patrie."

What worship this extraordinary man inspired and what adulation he was compelled to receive the foregoing clearly shows.

Wilhelmina Clauss (Madame Szarvady) may be referred to as an artist of our own time, although the younger generation of amateurs know her only by repute, if at all. She was born in Prague, just sixty years ago, and developed so quickly as a pianist that, at fifteen, she set out on tour as an accomplished executant. Germany received her well, but France—that is to say, Paris—held the young Bohemian at arm's length for a year, although Berlioz sounded her praises. If Fétis may be credited, she made her début at a concert given by Berlioz, and played the first Concerto of Beethoven. Losing her mother in Paris, she retired from public life for a year, under the care of Madame Ungher, and then set out upon a brilliant career. The young artist came to England in 1852, playing with success, the measure of which may be taken by reference to the pages of the Musical World. J. W. Davison, who knew how to judge a pianist, was one of her most ardent admirers, and wrote effusively in her praise. Madame Szarvady came amongst us again in 1871, and was last here in 1886. On that occasion, however, she performed only in private. Mr. A. Maczewski, writing in Grove's Dictionary, has thus summed up her merits: "Her chief gift is the power of penetrating into the spirit of the work she executes; her conscientiousness is great, and she rejects all arbitrary interpretations, no matter how ingenious they may be. In this respect she worthily ranks with Madame Schumann. Still Madame Szarvady has a strong and romantic individuality, which used to be very charming."

Before me lies "Dove Sono," a little book of poems published anonymously. The writer will not be angry if I make known his identity in saying that it is good to find the elder son of James William Davison in possession of his father's sensitiveness to the art of music. The longest piece of the collection is addressed to some nameless lady, and, in the course of certain reminiscences, the author tells her:

Those were the teeming days when first I heard
Music whose passionate emotion stirred
My being until, like some life-banished bird
Of ocean, that its ancient home again
Finds, and the dear deep moaning of the main,
I, hearing Manfred, felt my pain set free
And changed to a joy, a wild yearning to be
More to Schumann than sea-gull to the sea—
To range those life-waves of suffering, to rest
A weary wing on the warm-swelling breast
Of that stirred deep, to feel that throbbing heart
Glowing with love, baffled, bewildered, its smart
Of agony to share. And where were you
Who might, with me, have felt that music true?

A sonnet, "On Certain Music," is of older date, but strikes a more thrilling chord:

Higher and higher than his highest flight
The lark soars upward in the evening sky,
To gaze upon the dying sun's last sigh
And drink the splendour of the mystic light.
Higher he soars and gazes with rapt sight,
Till the reflected fire has left his eye;
Then does he fail, and, with a wild, low cry,
Falls earthward, wearied—sinks into the night.

So ends my trance upon that fading chord
Of sorrow too sublime for earthly plaint,
The sadness of a setting sun. I've soared
And seen far glory till my soul was faint
With longing. Now I sink down like the lark,
The heaven unwon, to find the world all dark.

As a poet of music, Mr. Henry Davison becomes his relationship to one of the most acute, sensitive, and helpful critics that music ever had.

The tender yet subtle muse of Amy Levy (who died all too soon) has also sung in praise of the sister art. "A Minor Poet, and other Verse," published ten years ago, contains a brief poem, entitled "Sinfonia Eroica." It is a narrative addressed "To Sylvia" and tells how the writer went with others to a Concert—

. . . drawn by the magic name
Of one, a high magician, who can raise
The spirits of the past and future days,
And draw the dreams from out the secret breast,
Giving them life and shape.

While looking carelessly at the crowd, Sylvia's face is seen, and then comes the Symphony—

Clear and strong
Rushed forth the sound, a mighty mountain stream.
Across the clustering heads mine eyes did seem
By subtle forces drawn, your eyes to meet.
Then you, the melody, the summer heat,
Mingled in all my blood and made it wine.

The first movement ended—

Brief was the pause; then 'mid a hush profound,
Slow on the waiting air swelled forth a sound
So wondrous sweet that each man held his breath;
A measured, mystic melody of death.
And ever, as the music smote the air,
Mine eyes from far held fast your body fair.
And in that wondrous moment seem'd to fade
My life's great woe, and grow an empty shade
Which had not been, nor was not.
And I knew
Not which was sound and which, O Love, was you.

In "Gloucestershire Notes and Queries," Vol. V., Part iv., is a copy of a musical epitaph which exists in the Churchyard of Uley. I transcribe it here:

Sacred to the Memory of Thomas Ashmead, Senr., Clerk of this parish, who departed this life
February 3rd, 1811, aged 76 years.

Psalm the 100th.

Also Betty, wife of the above Thomas Ashmead, departed this life May 8th, 1797, aged 64 years.

So the old parish clerk "gives out" the Psalm from his grave, as before from his desk, and still bids all men sing "to the praise and glory of God." There may be other epitaphs of a similar kind in our Parish Churchyards, and if my readers know of any I shall be glad to receive particulars.

I have found some interesting musical gossip in Madame Ducrest's "Memoirs of the Empress Josephine." The stories are not all new, and may not be all true, but they are, at any rate, well found. Madame Ducrest's mother had sought refuge in London from the Red Terror, and here supported herself and family as a musical teacher and performer. Among her visitors were Dussek and Cramer—rivals, yet intimate friends. On one occasion, Dussek came late, and was asked by Cramer the reason why. "I have been busy composing a new Rondo," said the tardy comer; "I was very well pleased with it, and yet, though perfectly satisfied with the result of my labour, I have thrown the manuscript into the fire." "But why?" "I will tell you. I had introduced a confounded passage which I practised for several hours without being able to execute it. I suspected you would play it off-hand, and I was determined not to submit to such a mortification." This was said in the hearing of more than thirty persons. There is an anecdote of Jarnowick who rebuked a clatter of tea cups at one of his Concerts by playing "J'ai du bon tabac," instead of the piece in the programme. "These people," said he to the orchestra, "know nothing about music. I will give them something better suited to their tastes. Anything is good enough for these drinkers of warm water." The remainder of the Concert passed off quietly. Of Garat and Rode it is said: "They had an odd way of relating humorous incidents which they always pretended had occurred to themselves. They were on a footing of the closest intimacy, and they mutually vouched for the truth of each other's stories with such an air of gravity that people were at length persuaded to believe them."

Madame Ducrest has something to say about Paesiello. On one occasion the Emperor Napoleon attended a performance of that master's "Zingarâ in Fiera" and was delighted with the whole, above all with a certain air, on hearing which the Emperor turned to the composer, grasped his hand and exclaimed: "My good friend, the man who lays claim to this tune may safely call himself the greatest composer in Europe." Unlucky speech! The air was an interpolation by Cimaroso, and poor Paesiello went home excessively mortified. Next day Napoleon sent him a splendid present as solatium. Paesiello was not given to compliments. A lady having sung some of his songs in his presence, her friends approached to gather the praises naturally expected by them. The composer remaining silent they prompted him: "She has very fine eyes," said Paesiello. "No doubt, but do you not think she has a delightful voice?" "They are very expressive," said Paesiello. "Assuredly so; but what do you think of her method of singing?" "I never saw finer eyes," said Paesiello, whereupon the friends gave him up. According to our authoress the Italian master was one of those who think well of others, but better of themselves. "He was of opinion that he composed in a superior style, and that many others acquitted themselves well. This is allowing more than ordinary talent is disposed to concede."

Madame Ducrest repeats the story of the trick played upon Napoleon by Méhul, with his "L'Irato," which he introduced as the work of an Italian. The master of many legions was a dangerous man to trifle with, and his remark, "Deceive me always in this way and I shall rejoice at it as much for my own satisfaction," must have relieved the composer of no little apprehension. Méhul's own good nature was severely tried on the occasion of a visit to his native place, Givet. Anxious to do him honour, a deputation waited upon the composer with a request that he would attend a performance of his "Une Folie" at the theatre. Méhul consented, and in due time found himself installed in a kind of niche decorated with figured tapestry and paper flowers. When the curtain rose, an actor recited some verses in praise of the evening's guest, and finished by saying that, as musicians could not be procured, they would play the opera with all the music left out. This done, a clay bust of the composer was brought forward to be crowned. Unfortunately, the actress who performed the ceremony pressed down the emblem of sovereignty with such force that the figure's nose came off and had to be fixed on with a black pin. Méhul covered his laughing face with a handkerchief, and the newspapers reported him as deeply affected by the homage of his fellow townsmen.

Steibelt's eccentricity of behaviour is well illustrated in a story which tells how he accepted an invitation to a musical party, and, for once in a way, put in an appearance. He was just sitting down to the pianoforte when a dignified elderly lady, rouged and painted, but clothed in black, entered the room. Seeing her, Steibelt moved away from the instrument. The host entreated him to resume his place. "I am not in the habit of playing for family pictures," said Steibelt. "While she is here my fingers are motionless. Stay till the black lady goes away and I will do anything you wish." Despite entreaties, the pianist kept to his resolve. As a teacher his habits were peculiar. Instead of making the pupil repeat defective passages, he would play them himself, and often start an improvisation which lasted during the remainder of the lesson. This reminds me of a professor (not of music) in whose class I once studied. Exceedingly fond of hearing himself talk and of exhibiting his stores of information on every possible topic, the red herring of some subject other than that of the lesson was always drawn across his path when our exercises were imperfectly prepared. Away he would go after it and rarely stop till the allotted time had expired. We may be very sure that Steibelt's lazy pupils played him a like trick.

In my remarks upon Sterndale Bennett, last month, I expressed a hope of obtaining some information regarding the county to which the family of that eminent musician belongs. I now have to acknowledge, with thanks, receipt of a letter from Mr. W. Sterndale Scarr, a nephew of the master, in which the writer says:

"I have heard my late mother—who was Sterndale Bennett's sister—say that her grandfather, John Bennett, was from Derbyshire, and spoke with the dialect of that county. Sterndale Bennett's mother was a Miss Donn—her father being a Scotchman, and curator of the Botanical Gardens and compiler of botanical works of considerable renown."

Mr. Scarr informs me, also, that Sterndale Bennett was named after a Dr. Sterndale; and gives some interesting particulars concerning his introduction to the Royal Academy of Music:

"After his father's death, he, with his two sisters, were brought by coach to Cambridge. During the journey, the eldest child (my mother) was induced to sing to the occupants of the coach, and one of the company was so delighted with her voice, that he mentioned it to some one at the Academy—I think Dr. Crotch—who sent a professor down to Cambridge to try her voice, but she was too shy to sing before him. Her brother was then brought forward and so pleased the professor that he was taken to London. Marianne, the sister, had one of the sweetest voices ever heard, but could not be induced to sing in public. When she has been singing to her children I have seen a small crowd of listeners in front of the house wondering who the sweet singer could be."

I have received a letter from Mr. Silas in which he contests my statement that Ferdinand Hiller was the last of the public improvisers on the pianoforte. Mr. Silas speaks with authority, declaring himself to be a survivor of the band. I am happy to know it and take the present opportunity of wishing him long continuance. When next he improvises may I be there to hear. X.

GREEK MUSIC.

Students of early musical history will welcome Mr. Monro's "Modes of Ancient Greek Music"* as a valuable addition to the literature on the subject. Mr. Monro takes an entirely new view of the nature of the Greek Modes, and supports it by strong arguments from ancient writers. The view generally accepted at present is as follows: The terms Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, &c., were used in two senses—viz., as applied to the fifteen keys or transpositions of the scale of A minor (in its descending melodic form), described by Alypius and others; and as applied to the several modes or octave-species, meaning the order of tones and semitones within a given octave, after the manner of the Gregorian "modes," though differing from these in detail.

Mr. Monro strongly opposes this view, at any rate with regard to the earlier periods of Greek music; and he endeavours to show that the distinctions between the various octave-species were merely an outcome of the theoretical speculations of Claudius Ptolemy, and others of his time; that they were in all probability scarcely recognised by practical musicians; that the word ἁρμονία used by Plato and Aristotle, and usually translated by "mode," will be better translated by "key" or "scale"; and that this word in reality referred to mere differences of pitch, the same order of intervals being retained in each ἁρμονία.

The author says, on p. 5: "I shall endeavour to show that there was no such double use (of the terms Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, &c.); that in the earlier periods of Greek music the scales in use, whether called τόνοι or ἁρμονίαι, differed primarily in pitch; . . . and that the passages on which the opposite view is based—all of them drawn from comparatively late writers—either do not relate to these ancient scales at all, or point to the emergence in post-classical times of some new forms or tendencies in musical art."

The above passage gives the thesis of the work; how successfully Mr. Monro maintains it must be left for readers to judge for themselves. The feeling of a major and minor "octave-species" or mode, and the idea of various modes of Gregorian music are so firmly fixed in the minds of all musicians that it is difficult to believe that variety had no place in the Greek modes; that they were all mere transpositions of the scale of A minor.

The only possible means of proving the case would be the recovery of a sufficient quantity of ancient compositions to enable comparisons to be made as to their form and construction; and, since the recent discoveries at Delphi, we may reasonably hope that in course of time excavators may find something that will throw further light on this obscure but interesting question.

Speaking of the "Hymn to Apollo," Mr. Monro says (p. 139): "The general impression made by the diatonic parts of the melody is that of the key of C minor. . . . This conclusion, it need hardly be said, is in entire agreement with the main thesis of the preceding pages." Again (p. 141): "On the whole it would seem that the only mode (in the modern sense of the word) of which the new discoveries tell us anything, is the mode practically identical with the modern minor. I venture to think this a confirmation, as signal as it was unexpected, of the main contention of this treatise."

The two chief difficulties connected with the usually accepted theory are: 1. That though the ancient writers are perfectly clear and intelligible with regard to the naming of the scales of transposition, each at a semitone above the last, there is considerable confusion with respect to the naming of the octave-species; and the order of the names, when applied to the octave-species, appears to be exactly the reverse of the order of the same names as applied to the keys. Thus the Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian keys are represented respectively by the minor scales of B flat, C, D; while the Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian octave-species or modes, according to Ptolemy, represent the order of tones and semitones given by the white notes of the pianoforte from respectively E to E, D to D, C to C. 2. Even if it be granted that difference of ethos or character is produced by difference of the order of tones and semitones in the diatonic genus, the particular ethos must certainly be lost in the enharmonic and chromatic genera, in which the whole order of the intervals is changed.

With respect to the first difficulty, Mr. Monro considers (p. 77) that it was impossible that the modes should follow one another in exactly the reverse order of that observed by the keys; for this would induce a feeling of ambiguity in the use of the terms of which (p. 30) there is no trace in the Greek writers. The second difficulty is considerably cleared up if we accept Mr. Monro's contention (p. 66) that ethos depended on pitch and genus, and not the order of tones and semitones.

Although Plato lays considerable stress on the difference of ethos produced by the various "modes," yet Mr. Monro shows (pp. 8, 11, 13) that the difference was almost certainly one of pitch only. In the passage of Aristoxenus in which the Hypo-Phrygian aulos is mentioned (in which Westphal thought that aulos was a corruption of tonos), Mr. Monro shows (p. 17) that there is agreement about the order of keys with respect to pitch. This reminds us that the flute (aulos) seems to have been in various keys, like our modern clarinet—as there are the A clarinet, the B flat, the C, and the E flat, so there appear to have been a Dorian, a Phrygian, a Lydian, &c., flute; and we may infer that there was the same kind of difference in the tone quality of the various flutes as in that of the various clarinets. This would be a further point in favour of Mr. Monro's theory; for the sensitive ear of the Greek would certainly attach considerable importance to the differences of tone quality produced by the differences in the fundamental pitch of the auloi, just as our modern composers do with regard to the clarinet.*

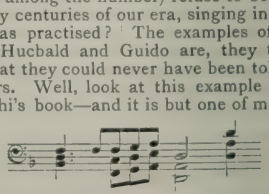
Mr. Monro gives a very clear explanation of the principles on which the notation is based, showing that the exact position of the "moveable notes" is not given by it. In his preface he congratulates the French School of Athens on the excellent form in which its musical discoveries have been placed at the service of students; and in a foot-note on p. 124 he remarks that the Aristoxenean school practically adopted the system of equal temperament. We need hardly remind our readers that the last-mentioned points are in entire accordance with the views we have recently maintained in these columns.

Some suggestive remarks were made during last month at the Tonic Sol-fa Conference held at Sheffield. The Tonic Sol-faists are essentially a practical body, and the opinions of their leaders are always worthy of consideration. Perhaps the most important matter discussed was the teaching of music in our schools, which are not under direct Government control. In comparatively very few schools can the divine art be said to be taught in a satisfactory manner, and there is undoubtedly much truth in Mr. McNaught's assertion that this arises from the idea that teaching music means teaching the pianoforte. "Music is the pianoforte, and the pianoforte is music" would, it is to be feared, be an acceptable definition of the art by many schoolmasters and mistresses. Without adopting too optimistic a view, it may reasonably be anticipated that as the refining and elevating influences of music are more fully realised, parents will require rudimentary knowledge of the subject to be included in the ordinary curriculum, and no longer tolerate it being placed amongst the "extra subjects." The advantages accruing from class-singing only need to be more widely recognised to be insisted upon, and it behoves young teachers to study how to impart this knowledge, either by Professor Bridge's or the Tonic Sol-fa system. Dr. Dunstan, whose paper on "Hints to young composers" must have been pleasant hearing to many ardent spirits yearning for public recognition, uttered a welcome protest against the disposition of many to regard music merely as an amusement and recreation. It is both—most emphatically, but the amusement and recreation are of a kind that cannot be fully enjoyed without exerting a beneficial influence, and for this reason music is entitled to be placed in the first rank amongst the implements of civilization. We are very Greek, or try to be, in our artistic ideal to-day. Our women affect Greek robes, our composers write incidental music to Greek plays, we are digging and delving in placid mother earth for Greek hymns, and theorising with the magnificent loquacity born of ignorance concerning Greek notation. And we are very happy about it; but we should be happier if we more fully realised the great elevating power of music as did the ancient Greeks. In this particular, then, let us strive to be Greek indeed.

An esteemed correspondent reminds us, àpropos of the article in our last issue on the hitherto overlooked book of Radino's Harpsichord (or Virginal) Music, that a book of pieces by Giovanni Picchi, who flourished in Venice early in the seventeenth century, was reprinted—done into modern notation by Dr. Chilesotti—a few years ago in Messrs. Ricordi's edition of "Musical Rarities." It bears a title very similar to that of Radino's book—viz., "Intavolatura di Balli d'Arpicordo di Giovanni Picchi Organista della Casa Grande in Venetia Novamente Corrette ristampate. In Venetia, Appresso Alessandro Vincenti. MDCXX."—and contains twelve pieces. From the examples we gave of Radino's music, our correspondent judges the style of the two writers to have much in common. There is a certain amount of truth in his contention, but a careful comparison of both the volumes, which we have just made, reveals the fact that as regards melodic charm, expression, and, especially, harmony, Radino is far ahead of Picchi. Radino's work was published in 1592, and though we do not know the date of the first edition of Picchi's work, it can scarcely have antedated the second by twenty-eight years. We may therefore conclude that Radino preceded Picchi, and this fact proves him to have been a musician of exceptional gifts, for the qualities in which he excels Picchi are precisely those which were only then beginning to manifest themselves in instrumental music. Picchi's sense of tonality, as we now understand it, is very weak. He flounders about among unrelated chords in the most helpless way on almost every page, and his consecutive fifths and octaves are much more numerous and objectionable than those of Radino.

By the way, how is it that, with such examples as these sixteenth and seventeenth century writers before them, so many modern musicians (Sir George Macfarren was among the number) refuse to believe that, in the early centuries of our era, singing in fifths and octaves was practised? The examples of organum given by Hucbald and Guido are, they tell us, so hideous that they could never have been tolerated by human ears. Well, look at this example of a bass from Picchi's book—and it is but one of many—



Yet although this was printed in the seventeenth century, there are still persons who refuse to believe that similar passages were tolerated in the ninth!

* The aulos, although usually translated by "flute," was a reed instrument; and M. Victor Mahillon, the keeper of the Museum of the Royal Conservatoire of Brussels, found at Rome, in 1892, convincing evidence that the reed was double, similar to that of the modern bassoon.

It is interesting to find, on comparing the music of Radino and Picchi with that of Byrd, Bull, and other English writers of the same epoch, that the Northerners show infinitely more skill as harmonists than the two Italians. Crudities and consecutive fifths are rare, and the polyphony is richer, being indeed more of the kind suitable to the organ. The Italians, on the other hand, are more graceful; their melodies are clearer in outline and their rhythms show more variety and life. Their work is less conscientious and thorough than that of our writers, but it makes a far better effect. Have these things been much changed in the space of 300 years? We trow not.

One of our readers, an eminent critic and musical antiquary, complains because, in our examples from Radino's book, the time-values of the notes were reduced to half those of the original. This, he says, destroys the educational value of the extracts. We do not agree with him. The modern musician has habits which, as regards this question of time-value, differ entirely from those of sixteenth century performers. The crotchet, not the minim, is his unit. It was not a question of bringing forward old notations —had it been this we should have given fac-similes— but one of presenting old music. In pursuance of this we discarded the "letter" for the "spirit." We may mention that in all Dr. Chilesotti's reprints of sixteenth and seventeenth century instrumental music, the plan has been adopted of reducing the time-values to half those in the original editions, and we scarcely need point out that this has also been done in many of the very best modern hymnals. Nothing can be gained, we think, by presenting ancient music—already sufficiently strange to modern ears to repel many—in a garb that makes it more difficult to read than music of the present day. By all means let us preserve examples of the various stages through which musical notation has passed, and by all means let these be made accessible to students. But to resuscitate them appears to us to savour of pedantry. In the fine edition of the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, now being prepared by Messrs. Fuller Maitland and Barclay Squire (noticed in our last issue), the notes are printed as in the original; and very rightly, for the book has never before been printed at all, and it is necessary that we should have one edition of it preserving the features of the MS. Should any of the pieces be reprinted later, in other editions, we should decidedly recommend as complete a modernisation of the notation as possible.

The combination of sportsman and musician is not very common, but it existed to perfection in Colonel Peter Hawker, the author of that classical text-book, "Instructions to Young Sportsmen," whose diary has just been published by Messrs. Longmans. The Colonel, who was born in 1786 and gazetted in 1801, served with the greatest distinction and bravery throughout the Peninsular war, and was so severely wounded at the battle of Talavera, in 1809, that he was never fit for field duty again and retired from the service in 1813. For the remainder of his busy and active life he entered with characteristic energy into a variety of pursuits, his two chief hobbies being music and sport. He was, to quote his own phrase, "shooting mad and music mad," and in his diary these two ruling passions are often brought into simultaneous relief in the most comic manner. Thus, writing on September 29, 1836, he remarks, "I read to-day with tears of the death of the unrivalled Malibran; and I also lost my beautiful Newfoundland dog of the distemper." In another passage he describes a sportsman as "the Mozart of all the wild-fowl men," and calls a favourite weapon "a Paganini of guns"; while, in describing a view of Ulleswater, he concludes, "In a word, the view creates a sort of sensation which we feel on hearing Mozart's music, seeing Shakespeare's tragedies, hearing Braham sing, or seeing ourselves surrounded by a good evening flight of wild-fowl." We wonder what the good Colonel would have thought of "La Navarraise," in which music and shooting are brought into closer connection than in, perhaps, any other work in the whole annals of the art.

An interesting event occurred in Dublin on the 10th ult., when Wagner's "Meistersinger" was introduced for the first time to an Irish audience. The Irish Daily Independent for the following day devoted upwards of a column to the performance, and we make no excuse for quoting a few characteristic passages from a highly entertaining article:—"Last night's performance was not over till a quarter to twelve, despite the 'cuts' which were lavishly indulged in, and the audience during the last two scenes was evidently in a state of the most unbearable anxiety about the last tram. The result was that the precipitous exit from all parts of the house spoiled the pleasure that the genuine Bohemians present might have fully enjoyed." The critical part of the article is quite as striking as the descriptive, for we are told that the music of the "Meistersinger," "when it is compared with such masterpieces of the great German as 'Lohengrin' and 'Tannhäuser,' cannot but be considered to some extent crude." It is only fair to the Independent to add that it displays due enthusiasm over the selection from the "Bohemian Girl," which was performed on the same night in Dublin, and alludes in terms of fitting veneration and respect to that "immortal ballad 'The heart bowed down.'"

Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henschel, and the Earl of Dysart are among the patrons of an interesting scheme put forward by Miss Annie C. Muirhead, whose aim is to give "Concerts for Children," at which they will have frequent opportunities of hearing the best music, and having their attention drawn by a lecturer to the chief beauties of the compositions—in short, of being taught how to listen. It is proposed to give five Concerts during the next five months, either in the Kensington or Hampstead districts. They will take place on Saturday afternoons. The districts mentioned have been chosen on account of the number of schools they contain, Miss Muirhead rightly assuming that a great obstacle in the way of sending children to Concerts is the distance of the Regent Street centre from their temporary or permanent homes. The fee for the five Concerts will be ten shillings, and the masters to be first drawn upon are Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Mozart. The scheme has our cordial wishes for its success and wide extension. The prospectus informs us that the Concerts will not be started before a promise of adequate support has been received. Miss Muirhead's address is 60, Lawford Road, N.W.

SCHOOL SCALES.

Oh, pity an unhappy man
Who hears, without cessation,
A noise which makes him find he can Pursue no occupation!

My tortured ears with scales are rent,
I seem to be in Hades;
Next door there's an "Establishment"
Where they instruct Young Ladies.

My home once seemed to me so dear;
Until—I felt surprise then—
They came; their scales fell on my ear:
The scales fell from my eyes then.

Throughout each day—this I resent—
That something should be played is
The rule in that Establishment, Adjoining, for Young Ladies.

The scales are terrible affairs,
The tunes are fearful jig ones;
The little girls play little airs,
The bigger girls play big ones.

And Sunday brings no rest, they're bent
On hymns—say, Tait and Brady's—
That excellent Establishment
For training good Young Ladies.

I like to hear the cooing dove,
The bee's soft, soothing humming;
My garden I no longer love,
I only hear that strumming.

Compared to where my life is spent
How calm a cannonade is!
Oh, bother that Establishment
Intended for Young Ladies!

I long to fly, and never pay
The rent I owe, or can owe,
Since I am tortured all the day
By that vile school piano.

To fly to Caithness, Cork, or Kent,
Calcutta, Cairo, Cadiz,
Far, far from that Establishment—
Confound it!—for Young Ladies.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Mr. Bonawitz perseveres with his invisible musical performances, one of which took place in Queen's Hall on the 27th ult. I cite a caustic passage from the announcement of the Concert in question: "There are many concert-goers who . . . will consider Invisible Concerts one-sided and tedious, if not ridiculous, because they are deprived of one of their chief occupations—looking at the artists and taking notice of their appearance, dress, and peculiarities." I certainly shall not deny this soft impeachment. Where, for example, would the Richter Concerts be if there were not Dr. Richter to look at?

"Werre at his begynnyng," says Chaucer, "hath so greet an entre and so large that every wight may entre when him liketh and lightly fynde werre, but certes what ende schal falle thereof it is not likely to knowe." War was declared some time ago, I am sorry to say, between the parson of Rington and his schoolmaster-organist, the first giving and the second receiving formal notice to quit. As often happens under such conditions, matters between the belligerents did not improve, and the parson warned the organist that he would not be allowed to play any more. Clearly, the man of music should have submitted to authority, but he appears to have conceived that, until the expiration of his term of notice, he had a right to the organ stool. Betaking himself to that seat on a recent Sabbath he found the parson's son in possession and playing the voluntary. The stool, according to report, immediately became a battleground, as did the manuals, on which the fingers of both performers were, it is said, engaged at the same time. This brought up the churchwarden, who, resorting to the arm of flesh, tried to drag the organist away. But while the warden held on to his man, his man held on to the organ stool, and both were haled—the parson's son having first been upset—into the body of the church. Then, it appears, the churchwarden retired from conflict, and the victor resumed his place at the instrument. Meanwhile, law, in the person of a policeman, had been invoked; that terror to evil-doers eventually prevailing on the organist to leave the church, and so the scene came to an end. A crop of summonses sprang up, of course, with the result that the organist was mulcted in the sum of £4 14s. 6d. The congregation in Rington church must have been edified by what they saw. It appears that the war of parson and organist is bound to break out somewhere, "but certes what ende schal falle thereof it is not likely to knowe."

A gallant ex-sergeant of foot held for some years the post of organ-blower in a certain cathedral church. At last the time came for him to surrender at the summons of all-conquering Death. When lying moribund the old man was visited by the assistant-organist and the following conversation took place: "How is the master" (meaning the organist-in-chief)? "He is well." "D'ye think he'd plaay the Dead March vur I when I be gone?" "I have no doubt he would, Sergeant." "Ask un, ool'e?" "Certainly I will." "But tell'n, I d'want'n to plaay Handel's Dead March, not that cock-a-doodle theng o' Beethoven's." "All right, Sergeant, I will tell him." The ancient warrior remained silent for some time, and then, with a gleam of humour remarked: "One good theng: I sha'nt have to blow't!" He remembered many a hard struggle to provide enough wind for the throbbing pedal notes. Handel's piece was duly played. Fact.

The "rich Englishman" who buys doubtful relics has turned up again. He was last heard of at Bologna, where he purchased a watch set with imitation diamonds and declared once to have been worn by Rossini.

I congratulate Mr. A. R. Gaul upon having excited a very enthusiasm of admiration down in Somersetshire. The Taunton Choral Society met a few weeks since to arrange matters for the coming season, and among the works chosen was Mr. Gaul's "Una." Reporting this, a local newspaper went on to say: "Mr. A. R. Gaul is the best English composer of choral music. Villiers Stanford and Mackenzie are as correct in form as anyone can be, but their music is as dry as dust for the listener. Sullivan has written some pretty melodies, but he has allowed himself to degenerate into a London edition of Offenbach, and too much of his later work reminds us of his earlier writings—sometimes, indeed, of the works of other composers. Gaul is as tuneful as Sullivan at his best; is as correct in form as the two professors named; and is more 'solid' and fuller in his harmonies than all the lot put together." In these days of carping and cavilling, of doling out praise with one hand and taking it back with the other, it is good to come upon such an outburst of honest and hearty admiration. We may not all share it, but we must all look respectfully upon the composer who has inspired it.

Mr. Gaul's panegyrist speaks quaintly about some features in "Una." "Gaul's treatment of the baritones is generally ambitious. In this point some people are not altogether pleased with him; but 'some people' are always found to pitch upon a man's peculiarities. However, those who like to hear a rollicking bit of lower register bass will be disappointed. Upper story baritone is the fare for the Hermit and for Prince Arthur in 'Una.'" "Upper story baritone" enriches the vocabulary of criticism and is good.

Charity covereth a multitude of sins, we are told, and surely whatever a man does in the name of that cardinal virtue should not be examined for faults. At the same time, one may draw lessons. At a recent meeting in Norwich, on behalf of the Jenny Lind Hospital, the Dean dwelt upon the value of sympathy to executive musicians, and said: "They could not interpret the glorious thoughts of Handel in his great and majestic conceptions, of Mendelssohn in his wild harmonies, of Haydn in his chromatic eccentricities, without sympathy." The speaker's meaning is clear and correct, but before he next attempts to characterise the music of other composers than Handel, Mr. Dean had better consult his organist.

An Edinburgh correspondent writes to me: "I often wish you could find time or inclination to give us in The Musical Times some short chatty biographical sketches of our old English musicians and cathedral organists, such as Tallis, Byrd, Farrant, Boyce, Crotch, Green, &c.; down to Sir John Goss. It would be both interesting and instructive—intensely so to all church musicians and organists." The suggestion is worth considering, and if it should appear that my readers approve, there is no reason why it should not be acted upon.

I hear from Mr. Hamish MacCunn that he is well pleased with the artists chosen to take part in the production of his opera, "Jeanie Deans," at Edinburgh, on the 15th inst. Mr. MacCunn will conduct the first performance in the Scottish capital and also the first performance in Glasgow. His next opera will have a Highland subject; libretto by the Marquis of Lorne.

Someone has sent me a lovely extract from a Brisbane journal: "There was a perceptible nervousness about the young violinist as he dallied with his bow at the onset. There was an inflowing of confidence, however, when he warmed to his work, and his imagination enkindled. Thrills and dazzles of notes seemed to hover and dance about his violin, scatter and disperse to point out the music tracks for deep guttural sobs and plaintive undertones. Frequently a downpour of rejoicing top notes would shower itself away. Faster and faster ran the nimble fingers till the instrument seemed to quiver with hilarity and the flood-tide of Hauser's Rhapsody. A moment's hush, then a thunder of applause rolled round the house. Again the violinist appeared and played a slumbrous deep-seated rhapsody that trailed languidly away ere the applause set in, and the violinist retired flushed with triumph." These coruscations appropriately sparkle in a journal entitled Flashes.

Acting upon examples now familiar to everybody, Mr. Charles Manners is about to offer a prize of 100 guineas and a percentage of receipts for the best operetta, suited to the requirements of his touring company. The conditions will shortly be published, and it is hoped that many competitors will accept them. Something may come of this, and in that hope I applaud the course taken by Mr. Manners.

The following has been "communicated":—"Under the direction of Mr. Ernest Cavour the first of the twenty-five Concerts of Messrs. Ben Davies, Tivadar Nachèz, and Algernon Ashton on the Continent took place yesterday (Monday, the 5th ult.) at the 'Philharmonic' in Berlin. The Concert was a most brilliant success and all three artists were most favourably received. Mr. Ben Davies was invited to sing in the 'Hofoper' from December 7 to 15, but had to refuse on account of his English engagements."

From the Norwood District Advertiser:—"An experienced lady gives lessons in music; pupils taught quickly and thoroughly; terms: one lesson per week, 5s. per quarter; two ditto, 8s. 6d., or sixpence and tenpence weekly.—Mater, 96, Gipsy-hill." Alas, poor Mater!

I note that the memory of the late J. W. Davison is, from time to time, insulted by folk who know nothing at all about him. Those who do know something write in another strain, among them Mrs. Louis Diehl. In her novel, "Elsie's Art Life," this authoress-musician gives a very genial, appreciative, and altogether accurate sketch of the great critic. Moreover, she makes one of her characters relate an anecdote concerning him. The true narrator is, no doubt, Mrs. Diehl herself. She says: "I was at a musical soirée given by the Marquise d'Estrées, quite one of the exclusive grandes dames of the Faubourg. Berlioz is, and was, to a certain extent, a hermit; still he appears now and then when you least expect him, wan and stately in his rusty evening suit, like the ghost of what he might be, but is not. He appeared there that night, and, as he has a leaning towards England and the English, my hostess introduced me. After a few cursory remarks he abruptly asked me if, being a London professor, I knew his good friend, Levison (Davison). I said I had the privilege to enjoy the honour of a slight acquaintance with him. 'Then,' he said, in that clear, decisive way of his—'then you have the honour, monsieur, of knowing the greatest critic in the world!" It seems to me that the opinion of Berlioz on such a point is worth a whole parliamentary session of ignorant or malignant cackle.

There is a lively writer "on" the Musical Courier. He came to Europe in the summer. He went to Bayreuth. He was not happy there. This he tells us in his paper. Telling, he uses short sentences:

"At last I reached Bayreuth. I stayed there three days. No Angerman's, so no supping ambrosia with the gods. No distinguished guests—all third-rate cockneys. No good music—Cosima has settled that. Awful singing, heat, flies, and exorbitant charges." Et tu, Brute!

The novelties at the Gloucester Festival next year will be (1) a Biblical cantata by Mr. Cowen; (2) a work of the same class by Mr. Lee Williams; (3) an organ concerto by Dr. Lloyd; (4) an orchestral piece by Miss Ellicott, and, possibly, an instrumental suite by Mr. German. Dr. Parry's "King Saul" will almost certainly have a place in the programme.

The musical value of Bayreuth may be declining as fast as some Wagnerians say it is, but there appears a chance of its appreciation as a matrimonial agency. I read: "The engagement of Miss M. H. Carroll, daughter of the late John Carroll, of Carrollton, Governor of Maryland, and granddaughter of the late Mr. Royal Phelps, of New York, to Count Charles von Fünfkirchen zu Gottenburg auf Iben, lieutenant of the third Bavarian Light Horse, has caused quite a sensation in Munich. One of the peculiarities of this affair is that the engagement grew out of the fact that both the parties were enthusiastic worshippers of Wagner's music, and met on the occasion of the recent performances at Bayreuth." The American Girl is not now likely to desert Frau Cosima.

Admirers of beauty are looking forward to the appearance amongst us of Miss Mary Louise Clary, an American contralto. The New York World says of this young artist: "A Kentucky girl and a native of Louisville, Miss Clary is a queen among her queenly Southern sisters. Tall, and as beautifully moulded as a Grecian statue, she has brilliantly dark hair and eyes, with a skin absolutely dazzling in its fairness. When looking upward her face is a superb St. Cecilia, and when the eyes are downcast she makes the perfect 'Delilah.'" And yet there are some who wish us to put our artists behind a curtain!

Mr. Allan A. Brown has given a remarkable collection of books to the Public Library of Boston. It contains 2,300 volumes of musical literature, and 1,236 orchestral scores, while, in all, the catalogue contains 11,000 entries. Few can estimate the patience and perseverance, to say nothing of the money, involved in the making of such a collection; fewer still, perhaps, are able to measure the sacrifice of the collector in allowing it to pass out of his hands. But Mr. Brown has done all the better because not many of us would be unselfish enough to imitate him were it in our power.

In No. 278 of this year's "Leipzig Neue Nachrichten" we read the following advertisement: "Marriage.—Wanted, by a young lady, who is musical, and in possession of means, a husband—pale, black hair, and with two Bechstein grands. Offers, with photo, not later than October 9, to be addressed," &c.

Mr. Cowen was reported in the Musical Courier as having "boldly declared that the intriguing and wire pulling of Mascagni and others of the brood of composerlings in Milan did much to make my opera ('Signa') fall flat." This the composer denies in the most absolute terms, confessing that he owes to Mascagni and others special gratitude for their sympathy and their cordial acknowledgment of his success with the Milanese public.

An American writer points out that in the "Gormanised Tariff Bill" musical instruments are classified under "explosive substances," and that the paragraph relating to them stands between those concerning friction matches and percussion caps. Which thing is an allegory.

It would seem that the America of Martin Chuzzlewit has not quite passed away. Miss Currie Duke, a Kentucky violinist, gave a Concert at Lawrenceburg not long since, and was introduced to the audience by Attorney L. H. Carter in a speech which contained the following gems: "The very distinguished daughter of one of Kentucky's most distinguished and honoured sons is here to ravish and steal away our hearts with the sweetest strains that ever breathed in human souls. Mythology tells us that Orpheus played so divinely on the lyre that all Nature stopped to listen to his music; and she who will open the crust of care to-night, and start the liquid flow of joy in your soul, is no unworthy disciple of him whose head and lyre floated 'down the swift Helms (sic) to the Lesbian shore.' From the hours of prattling childhood the witchery of her performance on the violin was known and appreciated—the wonder and pride of her friends. Kentucky is proud of her most distinguished daughter, and claims her as her own:—

> 'Ours while deathless love remains,
> Ours by right divine and human,
> Ours for worth and fame endears,
> And by a heritage in common,
> Ours through all eternal years.'

Beautiful, talented, distinguished, a great artist, and a superb type of womanhood I introduce to you in the person of Currie Duke." Poor Miss Currie! It is to be hoped, in the interest of her artistic modesty, that she did not listen to this balderdash.

A case of give and take! Mr. Ward McAllister, autocrat of New York "society": "I like Wagner in a good box at the Opera in New York or Paris, with a house brilliantly lighted up and full of handsome women in opera dress, where one can while away Wagner's long and stupid recitals by whispering pleasant things to charming women." The American Art Journal: "The sad thing about it is that such a jackass as McAllister is able to go to Bayreuth and fill his ears while the thousands of persons of culture to whom a Wagner season there would be a glimpse of heaven are unable to enjoy that great privilege." If Mr. McAllister really used the language with which he is credited, he cannot be a very wise person; but even he should know better than challenge Wagnerians to an interchange of epithets. They are old hands, and play with what devotees of whist call "the rigour of the game."

I know musical artists who aver that they read only what the newspapers say about themselves, passing the rest, and others who declare that they never read criticisms at all. According to an interviewer, Madame Melba asserts that, in the case of American newspapers, she is content to skim the head-lines. "Then I know the whole story."

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent).

The great Midland music meeting has been overtaken and left behind by steady-going Time, and now, at the distance of nearly a month, I have to look back upon it. If, in doing so, I am conscious of one thing more than another, it is that Festivals, as such, are difficult in great towns, though musical performances are rendered easy by all manner of resources. Not that, personally, I have any reason to complain. A happy hospitality made the Birmingham week festive for me in more senses than one. What I mean is that big cities, charged with varied and absorbing interests, cannot give themselves up to a musical celebration as do the smaller towns. With them a Festival is only an episode in civic life; in places less huge a Festival is, pro tem., that life itself, which makes all the difference. It may be said that the musical doings are the main point, everything else being merely accessory. I grant that, of course; yet it is good to see a community given up for a short time to the honour and glory of a liberal art. Decorated streets, in such a case, have their significance, and, through the public eye, educate the public mind to recognise that life is not a mere struggle of sordid interests. However, if the aspect of Birmingham was little affected by the Festival just past, much other was done, and now calls for record in these pages.

The constitution of the band and chorus was similar to that on previous occasions under Dr. Richter, and need not now be set forth. Let me say, however, that again comparisons not favourable to the orchestra were made by some who recalled the magnificent body of English performers which it was Sir Michael Costa's pride to direct. The Neapolitan conductor, it will be remembered, insisted on a larger number of instruments than that which satisfies Dr. Richter, and especially upon a stronger force of strings. For my own part, I certainly miss the splendid tone of the Costa orchestra, and the sonorous quality of its violins. It would, perhaps, be wise to augment the strings on another occasion, but, otherwise, it seems to me that attempts to improve the Birmingham band savour of gilding refined gold. It is a most capable organisation, and thoroughly satisfies the Conductor, who, I do not forget, presided over the matchless Bayreuth orchestra of 1876. With regard to the chorus, I am not able to express unqualified admiration. To me, indeed, it seems that Mr. Stockley's people were less efficient than in 1891. The basses, it is true, left nothing to desire, and the altos were a good average; but neither the sopranos nor the tenors touched the high-water mark of three years ago, the quality of tone coming short, and the attack of both sections often wanting decision. There is no occasion to be surprised at this, and no reason to fear that deterioration has come to stay. The chorus of a triennial festival necessarily fluctuates, the materials available being sometimes less excellent than at others. Wherefore, for any differences nobody can be held accountable. Turning to the principal vocalists, I must record an impression that, as a body, they were open to improvement. Happily, that impression seems to be shared by persons in influential quarters, and I look for better things on the next occasion. These observations made once for all, I turn to the order of events.

Birmingham remains faithful to "Elijah." Not even the tooth of Time can gnaw away the admiration she feels for the great Oratorio first given to the world within her gates. In a certain sense, which Birmingham appreciates, "Elijah" is her property, and she feels in relation to it all the pride of a possessor. Well, this is only natural; who will deny that it is laudable also, or that the Oratorio is a work in which pride is justified? A packed audience had long been a certainty, and when, on October 2, Mr. Andrew Black stood up to proclaim the punishment of a faithless nation, the Town Hall presented an appearance worthy of the occasion and the subject. I shall not dwell upon the rendering of music so familiar, nor do I care to invest with significance one or two slight blemishes. The domain of music enjoys no immunity from accidents, nor are those who dwell therein better able than others to guard against their occurrence. Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Marian McKenzie, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Edward Lloyd acquitted themselves as usual, special distinction among the soloists being limited to Mr. Black, whose work in the part of the Prophet was marked by dignity, dramatic power, and vocal skill, qualified only by an occasional tendency to exaggeration, against which so intelligent an artist will not fail to take precautions.

The second Concert on the opening day had not an attractive programme, and the paying part of the audience brought comparatively little to the treasury. It would appear, therefore, that the committee miscalculated the favour in which Berlioz's Te Deum is held, or made the mistake of supposing that the name of the French composer is itself a charm. But be that as it may, the Te Deum went for little in a pecuniary sense. Inasmuch as greater novelties demand the space here available, I shall not enter into an examination of the work, or contrast the circumstances to which it was originally adapted with those of its latest performance. Were I to do the one, I should have to express very qualified admiration, while the second process would decidedly call in question the wisdom of the committee's choice. The performance, generally good, did not err at all on the point of satisfying the composer's requirements as to noise. The final prayer, "Let me never be confounded," was, for example, emphasized by the energetic action of eleven drummers, one of whom came from the Continent to assist in storming the ear of Heaven. Whether the audience were themselves "confounded" by the violence of the appeal I know not, but the reception of the Te Deum can hardly be styled enthusiastic. After Berlioz came a miscellaneous assortment of composers, Brahms leading with his Second Symphony. Let me whisper that I fear this work was taken as an infliction by a large part of the audience. Enthusiastic musicians, no doubt, admired and profited; but in Birmingham, as elsewhere, they are the few not the many. Dr. Mackenzie's clever and humorous Overture, "Britannia," proved much more to the taste of the public, who cordially applauded the composer, by whom its performance was conducted. Liszt's Fourth Hungarian Rhapsody closed the Concert, after Mrs. Henschel had sung, in her own good style, an air from Handel's "Allessandro," and, with her gifted husband, a selection from "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Hubert Parry's "King Saul" occupied the whole of the second morning; also, such is the amplitude of its dimensions, a great deal of the afternoon. An "acting version" of this work will, of course, be prepared. In its present form it is impossible, save under very special conditions, and as "cuts" must be made, Dr. Parry should lose no time in making them himself. It is not that any part of the music deserves rejection, but simply that there can be too much even of a good thing. Last month's Musical Times contained a somewhat full description of "King Saul," and I now have only to state the conclusions suggested by a hearing of the music. One of them is to the effect that Dr. Parry would have done just as well had he avoided representative themes altogether. I say just as well, because the rather elaborate use made of them in the present case is productive of neither good nor harm. The device should be so used as that it cannot be ignored—as that the purpose for which it is employed stands out clear, distinct, and unmistakable. But the Leitmotiven in "King Saul" are, for the most part, obscured by other features more strenuous, direct, and powerful. I find the old plain oratorio fashion here mixed with a modern ingredient, and the two will not blend in required proportion. The old overpowers the new and practically annihilates it. Dr. Parry may rightly conclude, I think, that his style and method do not assimilate with the dovetailing and inlaying process which seems to have such a charm for contemporary writers. I repeat that there is no mischief done in "King Saul." The virility and force of the music neutralise what might otherwise have been deleterious, leaving only the uncomfortable reflection that Dr. Parry has taken much trouble for nothing. I must be critical a little further. Not a few passages, in the earlier part of the work particularly, excite a suspicion that the composer sometimes relaxes the vigilance with which a creative artist should always watch his own doings. A composer needs to be a self-censor—to throw his mind to a distance from his work and then turn round and examine it as though it belonged to another. Dr. Parry, often writing under the obligation of haste, does not always do this, and sometimes passes pages lacking the stamp of his individuality, or, as in certain cases, bearing that of another. There are moments, too, when he is not sufficiently on the look out for a tendency towards mannerisms—the besetting sin of prolific composers. At any rate, I think I see mannerism in the frequent orchestral interludes, with their repetitions of certain favourite "figures." With this remark my grumblings come to an end. How small they are in comparison with the bulk of my admiration for "King Saul" is a matter which, as concerning myself only, I need not enlarge. I admire not alone the qualities of manly strength and directness which have been already touched upon, but others of a yet higher kind, as, for example, the characterisation that helps so materially to relieve the fundamental sombreness of the dramatic subject. Here, as in so many other instances of the relations between men and gods, our sympathies are with the representative of humanity, and not with the harsh, revengeful embodiment of Fate. Dr. Parry (if the libretto be his) strives hard to divert attention from this point, and gives us scenes on which shines the sun of idyllic beauty. As musician he exerts himself strenuously to the same end, and though we must be sensible that not even casuistry can justify the ways of God to man in this particular case, we are grateful for a pleasant disguise of the cruel fact. Saul, in the tragic grandeur of a King whom Fate has resolved to ruin, remains the principal figure, sombre, pitiful, appalling; but we can turn our eyes to the love of David and Michal; to the maidens who sing of youthful heroism, and to the devotion of patriotism, there finding rest and relief, as much in the contrast of music as of character and circumstances. Shall I then say that "King Saul" is a great work, and so challenge comparison with the greatest? I will declare that, in my view, it has many of the elements of greatness—that it stands very near the throne, and that absolutely it is an honour to English art, of which all Englishmen are entitled to be proud. Such mistakes as are in it are not likely to occur in any future work, and high as it is the composer will make of it a stepping-stone to things yet higher. The figure of merit shown by the performance was only reached after strenuous effort against the disadvantages imposed by belated completion of the composer's task. It has been represented in some quarters that errors in the copies gave trouble which might and should have been avoided. That is a very inexact statement, as witness Dr. Parry himself, who declares "the parts were quite extraordinarily good, and could only have been brought up to that standard by patient care and considerable acuteness and intelligence in responsible quarters." It is well to nail a tarradiddle to the counter as soon as one detects it. Besides, trouble in the preparation of a long and difficult work is not so rare and surprising as that imagination should be set to find out a reason. The performance, directed by the composer, satisfied reasonable expectations, many of the solos and the more developed of the choruses being capitally given, and producing a great effect. The parts were distributed thus: Saul, Mr. Henschel; David, Mr. Lloyd; Samuel, Mr. Black; the Witch, Miss Hilda Wilson; the Evil Spirit, Miss Brema; and Michal, Miss Anna Williams. I have nothing but praise for the conscientious care and artistic skill with which these singers did their work, and my only regret is that space does not here serve for the pleasant task of dwelling upon particulars. Dr. Parry, it will readily be assumed, had again and again to acknowledge the plaudits of his audience not only at the close of the performance, but while it was proceeding.

As the morning of Wednesday had its novelty, so had the evening, which saw the first public performance of Goring Thomas's "The Swan and the Skylark." A general description of this posthumous work having already been given, I am able again to limit myself to impressions made by the performance, first stating that there had been for some days a run upon the ticket office, caused by, as some said, curiosity with regard to the new cantata, or, as others averred, by admiration of the "Lobgesang," which occupied the second half of the programme. With regard to the "Swan and the Skylark," I am bound to say the effect in performance did not quite justify expectations raised by perusal of the vocal score. The music, taken piece by piece, is pretty, graceful, sentimental, engaging—what you will in that way; but taken altogether, it is too uniformly pretty, graceful, sentimental, engaging. It has an effect akin to that which would attend living with a companion of unbroken amiability—one with whom it would be pleasant to quarrel just for a change. This need not have been the case. There is scope in the poetic subject for abundant and strong contrast, but the gentle composer had no depth of passion and little strength of hand. He was all grace and tenderness. Others raise edifices that reach the skies and impress us with a sense of majesty. He grew flowers in a quiet garden and was satisfied with their colour and fragrance. In connection with the Birmingham cantata, moreover, there was an appreciable sense of uncertainty as to origin, and a disquieting feeling that we were listening to a work which, possibly, the composer would never have produced. Anyhow, the experience was not quite satisfactory. Happily for the work, the early impressions of critical minds are not likely to affect the general public, who will see in "The Swan and the Skylark" very much that appeals to sentimentality, and also the full charm of luscious and expressive tune. Dr. Stanford has orchestrated the music cleverly, with due regard to the composer's own methods. The performance, directed by Dr. Richter, was creditable to all engaged, especially to the chorus, whose sympathy with their task could not have been greater. The solo honours easily fell to Mr. Lloyd in the important "Invocation of Summer"; but good work was done by Madame Albani, Miss Brema, and Mr. Brereton. I pass the rendering of Sullivan's "In Memoriam" and the "Lobgesang," though it took rank among the triumphs of the week. The principals were Madame Albani, Miss Brema, and Mr. Lloyd.

I pass, also, the performance of "The Messiah," on Thursday morning, simply remarking that Mr. Stockley conducted, with Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Brereton as solo vocalists.

Thursday evening brought the final novelty of the week—Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater"—concerning which many details were given in last month's issue of this journal. It is almost superfluous to point out the boldness of Mr. Henschel's venture. So far as I know, he had never before attempted so large a work, and he necessarily challenged direct comparison with distinguished writers who had essayed the same feat. The occasion, therefore, was for him a critical one. It passed and left the composer in a position distinctly enviable. There is no denying that he won a success under trying circumstances, and, at a step, gained a position such as changes for the better his relations to music in this country. This was to a great extent anticipated in the remarks which appeared last month; and now I would dwell for a moment upon the easy command of variety which adds so much to the interest of the work. No number is like another, yet all are alike as contributories to a common end. Moreover, the power of Mr. Henschel's music is steadily progressive, the last three numbers being those which most effectively assert the resources of the composer. Here are cardinal merits, to which may be added a wealth of melody nothing is permitted to obscure, and steady subordination of all artistic means to a devotional purpose. Perhaps the most conclusive proof of the fact that Mr. Henschel had not overrated his powers was given by the silent and sustained attention of the audience—always more flattering than the loudest applause. Through this came a favourable public verdict in support of one already pronounced by connoisseurs. Mr. Henschel had the advantage of conducting a really admirable performance, as to which it is difficult to say whether soloists, band, or chorus bore off the palm. Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Black were irreproachable, and the entire splendid interpretive machine worked smoothly and impressively to a satisfactory issue. The usual honours were paid to the composer-conductor, but not as a matter of form. Following the "Stabat Mater" came a magnificent rendering of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Even at Birmingham works of this class are to a great extent wasted upon Festival audiences, but Schubert, helped by the perfection of his interpreters, spake so as none could choose but hear. The performance was undoubtedly the greatest executive triumph of the week. Gounod's "Lend me your aid" (Mr. Lloyd), Brahms's Rhapsodie for alto solo (Miss Brema) and chorus, and Dvorák's "Husitska" Overture brought the Concert to an end.

The last morning performance was devoted to Cherubini's Mass in D, which had only a moderately good rendering, though there was no fault to be found with the principals, Madame Albani, Madame McKenzie, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel. The chorus were mostly at fault, their defective intonation being at times not only disappointing but painful. I need not discuss the Florentine master's noble work. It is a classic, and familiar. Following an impressive reading of the Good Friday music in "Parsifal" came Palestrina's "Stabat Mater" for double choir, as arranged by Wagner for a double quartet of soloists, in addition to the divided chorus. The performance, though the pitch dropped, was meritorious, and afforded a perfectly fair test of the Bayreuth master's bold editing. On the whole, I think Wagner should have let Palestrina alone. That great reformer of Church music knew what he was about, and his genius should be respected, even by the most gifted among his successors. Mozart's Symphony in E flat brought the Concert to an end, and was, I fear, neither appreciated nor understood. Something with eleven drums in it would have sent the audience away with ears ringing, and therefore with desires satisfied. Music in these days must appeal to the nerves.

The last performance of the series calls for few words only, the subject-matter being well known. It opened with the "Tannhäuser" Overture; hearing which the Birmingham audience showed genuine enthusiasm. Nothing had greatly moved them before, but their reserve broke down under the Pilgrims' Prayer and the clamorous utterances of the Venusberg. The third part of Schumann's "Faust" was received with less exuberance of feeling, yet seemed to please—a result hardly to be wondered at; and at its close the finishing touch was given to the Festival by the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, in which the chorus, having, like the Irish postillion, "kept a gallop for the avenue," exerted themselves splendidly. The orchestral movements were "read," as usual under Dr. Richter, and so the four days of music came to an impressive end. Among the main practical lessons to be drawn in view of the next Festival are these: Spare no effort to perfect the chorus and no expense in securing the best solo talent that money can buy. Such an investment of labour and capital always pays. Meanwhile, honour to the gentlemen who, like Mr. C. G. Beale, chairman of the general committee, and Mr. G. H. Johnstone, orchestral steward, charged themselves with the heavy duty of management, and neglected nothing. The amount available for the General Hospital, being donations and profit on working account, stands at about £4,000—a falling off from three years ago, but still a great advance upon earlier results.

MUSIC IN TEWKESBURY ABBEY.

It has long been a custom to celebrate the dedication of the famous old Abbey at Tewkesbury by means of a special musical service, and last year an advance was made towards a Festival scale of operations. This became possible when the County of Gloucester set about organising its musical resources to the end of promoting developments precisely of this kind. The celebration for the present year, which took place on September 27, was, very properly, an advance upon the doings of 1893, two choral performances being given instead of one and an Organ Recital. Circumstances, moreover, were altogether additionally favourable. The programme contained a new work, the inhabitants of the town showed sympathy with what was going on, and the public of the neighbourhood filled the venerable edifice on each occasion. It therefore seems likely that an unpretending Musical Festival has established itself in the Vale of Evesham. At present it is small, but the chances are that it will grow.

As last year, the Gloucester Festival Society supplied the executive means. The orchestra was made up of some thirty-five local performers, professional and amateur, while the Tewkesbury Philharmonic Society, aided by contingents from Gloucester, Cheltenham, and Malvern, formed a chorus of about 150 voices. Among the soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Jessie King, and Mr. Henry Guy; Mr. Lee Williams conducting the morning performance and Mr. Bath, Abbey Organist, that given in the evening. The novelty referred to above was a "Harvest Song of Praise," composed by Mr. Williams specially for the occasion. In dimensions and character it is adapted for use at harvest festivals, the aim being to provide a work not only longer than an anthem, but of greater constructive interest. Hence the new piece consists of a series of questions set as choral recitative, to which a soprano solo and chorus furnish replies in varied forms. The composer has very happily entered into the spirit of this device and completed a work of unaffected charm, no part being beyond the means of the average choral society. As may be supposed, much of the music has a pastoral character, and all of it is of the kind which appeals as well to the general public as to the connoisseur of pure and simple art. Under its composer's direction, the Harvest Song won great favour from its first audience, the soloist, Miss Anna Williams, contributing much to a good result. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" followed the new piece, and the proceedings closed with Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer." The Abbey was crowded in the evening, but the satisfaction of the audience was not complete. Instead of hearing "The Messiah" they were given only extracts, and these might have been better performed. On another occasion wiser counsels should prevail.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

On the 8th, 15th, and 20th ult. the three Concerts constituting Herr Richter's autumn season in London took place—the first and second in St. James's Hall, the third at Queen's Hall. Each programme contained a Beethoven Symphony, the seventh, fourth, and ninth being heard in the order named; and the second Concert included also the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, which suffers nothing by comparison even with the imaginative splendours of a Beethoven. Wagner, Weber, Smetana, Brahms, Grieg, and Dvorák furnished, between them, the remainder of each programme; but the works by which they were represented have been so often heard under the same conditions, that it suffices to say, with regard to their performance, that the standard to which Herr Richter has accustomed us was in every instance maintained. There are two aspects in which the absence of novelty which characterised the series may be viewed. We may dwell with complacency on the healthy taste revealed by the fact that works so well known had power on each occasion to fill the hall; or we may regret that appreciation of Herr Richter's renderings of these works should be so great that his patrons seek for no extension of knowledge. For ourselves, we confess to mixed feelings, further complicated by the reflection that native art should have been entirely unrepresented. At the first Concert Sachs's Monologue, "Wahn, wahn," and Wotan's "Abschied" were sung in the most artistic and expressive way by Mr. David Bispham. At the last Concert the vocalists were Miss Trebelli, Madame Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills (who were associated with the Richter Choir in a fine performance of the Choral Symphony), and Mr. William Nicholl, who joined Mr. Lloyd in the closing scene from Act I. of "Siegfried," in which the great English tenor sang even more gloriously than usual.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This new association, placed under the conductorship of Mr. William Carter, started its public career on the 18th ult. in the building after which it is named. For a society with aims so wide as to include operas of the young Italian school, excerpts from Wagner's works, and oratorios, there should be room in the metropolis, more particularly as it is not likely to clash with any other body. The work selected for the opening of the season was Haydn's

"Creation," which of late years, for no very apparent reason, has dropped out of the list of oratorios frequently performed in the metropolis. The chorus, though not evenly balanced and scarcely producing the tone that might be expected from such numbers, sang "The heavens are telling" and other striking portions falling to their share with zeal, intelligence, and boldness of attack. There being no serious shortcomings, it was a treat to hear once more the smoothly-flowing choral passages that have proclaimed Haydn a melodist of the first order. Mr. Carter conducted with both spirit and watchfulness. The solos were, of course, safe in the hands of the experienced Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Watkin Mills, all of whom were at their best. A capital band was led by Mr. J. Carrodus, and Mr. Arthur Fagge was at the organ. The hearty reception given to the performance testified to sustained appreciation of a work that has so much to recommend it, both to executants and listeners. Altogether the Queen's Hall Choral Society may be congratulated on having made a highly creditable beginning.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The first Concert of the thirty-ninth Saturday series was held on the 13th ult., the programme opening with Dr. Mackenzie's delightful "Britannia" Overture, which met with such success at the Birmingham Festival, and is ere long to be heard under Dr. Richter's direction at Vienna. Mr. Manns, who was greeted with great cordiality, secured a spirited interpretation of the overture, the gaiety of which proved greatly to the taste of the audience. In a selection from Bach's Suite in B minor for strings and flute, Mr. Fransella, the principal flautist of the Crystal Palace orchestra, acquitted himself admirably, though little opportunity for the display of the resources of the modern flute is to be found in Bach's composition. Mr. Willy Hess, the well-known leader of Sir Charles Hallé's Manchester orchestra, made his first appearance at these Concerts, and gave a thoroughly sound and legitimate rendering of the solo in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; he was also heard to advantage in familiar pieces by Spohr and Wieniawski. Equally well worn were the vocal selections from "Faust" and "Der Freischütz," contributed with efficiency by Miss Ella Russell. The programme was completed by an orchestral selection from the third Act of the "Meistersinger" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Mr. Manns, who was unfortunately incapacitated by the effects of an accident from appearing in his usual place at the second Concert, on the 20th ult., found a ready and efficient substitute in Dr. Mackenzie, whose thorough familiarity with Dvorák's new Symphony (No. 5), "From the New World," which he had already conducted at one of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts last season, enabled him to secure a remarkably fine interpretation of this picturesque work. It had been played for the first time in England at one of the daily Concerts at the Crystal Palace prior to its performance at the Philharmonic, but it was now formally introduced to the Sydenham audience by the full strength of the Saturday orchestra. As the Symphony and the somewhat revolutionary principles involved in its composition have already been discussed at length in these columns, it may suffice to say that its beauties as well as its incongruities become more manifest on further acquaintance, the slow movement, so beautifully scored for the wood-wind, making an especially favourable impression. Two novelties were included in the programme, of which the more striking was the "Tannhäuser" ballad for baritone and orchestra by Södermann, a Swedish composer who died in 1876. The voice part is exceedingly simple, but a remarkable effect is produced by the reiteration of a refrain in monotone in which the warning voice of the nightingale alluded to in the text is imitated in the orchestral accompaniment. The chief fault of this picturesque and charmingly scored composition is that it is too uniformly sombre in sentiment, and fails to illustrate Tannhäuser's sojourn in the Venusberg to which such direct reference is made in the words. The solo was delivered with intelligence, expression, and an agreeable quality of voice by Herr Lundquist, a baritone from the Stockholm opera, who was afterwards much applauded for his animated singing of a group of characteristic Swedish Folk-songs. Signor Sgambati's "Andante Solenne"—the other novelty—may best be designated as a dignified orchestral voluntary. It is based on an old canto fermo, assigned to the violins, the harmonies resting on a moving bass. Although described as for organ and strings only in the programme, the arrangement used on this occasion included brass instruments as well. In Tausig's arrangement of Chopin's Concerto in E minor, M. Siloti again proved himself to be a performer of great sympathy and refinement. Later on he gave solos by Liszt and Arensky with such success as to necessitate an encore. Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture and that to "Rienzi" completed the programme.

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL'S RECITALS.

Though described as an Orchestral Concert, the performance given by Mr. Franz Rummel, at St. James's Hall, on the evening of the 10th ult., partook of the nature of a Pianoforte Recital, taking into consideration the fact that the bulk of the programme consisted of three Pianoforte Concertos. Over a dozen years have elapsed since Mr. Rummel first appeared in London, and the number of high-class executants on the keyboard has prodigiously increased during the interim; but capable performers are always welcome, and in this category Mr. Rummel must certainly be included. The mere fact that he rendered in immediate succession such exacting works as Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 4), Schumann's only work of this nature, and that of Saint-Saëns in G minor (No. 2), affords sufficient evidence of his ability, and further praise may justly be bestowed on his efforts. Of a surety Mr. Rummel has improved in respect of delicacy of touch and general artistic finish of execution since he originally challenged the opinion of London musical amateurs, who are among the most fastidious in the world; the interpretation of the French composer's brilliant work being specially praiseworthy. The orchestra was by no means first-rate, but Dr. A. C. Mackenzie conducted it with much skill; and the scheme included Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's appropriate ending; Grieg's "Solveig's Song," as arranged for orchestra; and the "Furiant" from Dvorák's Suite in D.

On the 17th ult. Mr. Rummel gave the first of two Recitals at St. James's Hall, his programme containing Bach's "Italian" Concerto, Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, "Les adieux, l'absence, et le retour," Schubert's Fantasia (Op. 15)—sometimes known as the "Wanderer" Fantasia—and smaller pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Tschaikowsky, Brahms, Hans von Bülow, Raff, and Liszt. All these were remarkably well played, the compositions of Bach and Chopin especially.

The second and last Recital for the present was given on the following Wednesday (24th ult.), and again an excellent programme was offered to an audience that would have doubtless been larger in numbers but for the exceptionally adverse weather. The principal works were Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" Variations, Beethoven's so-called "Moonlight" Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 2), the first two movements of which were beautifully played, and Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17)—perhaps, after a few of Beethoven's Sonatas, the greatest work ever written for the instrument. The reading of this terribly difficult music was thoughtful and intelligent above the average. Minor pieces by several composers followed, and Mr. Rummel would seem to be well satisfied with his reception in London this autumn, as he announces two more Recitals at St. James's Hall in February next.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first series of Wednesday Lectures to the students of this Institution was delivered by the Principal on the 3rd, 10th, 17th, and 24th ult., and consisted of a resumé of the progress of music from the time of Ambrose to the Renaissance period. In his opening remarks Dr. Mackenzie complained that students were too well content to remain ignorant of the elements of their art, both as regards theory and history. The elements of musical theory were, however, provided for by classes instituted for that purpose and were, moreover, easily accessible in book form; but the elements of the art itself, considered in their historical development, were not sufficiently known. It was, of course, true that the first attempts at oratorio and opera, and the consequent growth of instrumental music in connection with dramatic action, concerned us more nearly than the music of earlier times; but for all that we might look back with great profit into the dark and watch the gradual appearance of the light. One thing, at any rate, we learnt from such an investigation—namely, that every country had borne an honourable share in the development of the art. The lecturer then gave a succinct account of the classification of the Authentic and Plagal Modes and of the early forms of Plain Song, sketching briefly the progress of music until the time of Charlemagne. He dealt also with the bards of Germany, France, and Britain, and pointed out the advanced state of the art in our own country. Dr. Mackenzie dwelt at some length on Charlemagne's encouragement of Folk-song, and said that the secular songs of that period might safely be divided into six classes, viz.:—

1. Minnelieder, or love songs;
2. Satirical songs;
3. Songs of loose character (not allowed in the vicinity of churches, but not forbidden by law);
4. Lob, or Ehren-lieder—songs in praise of deeds of honour or of prowess;
5. Teufels lieder (Devil songs)—sung by the people at night in or about graveyards, to frighten away evil spirits who came to disturb the peace of the dead;
6. War songs—among the most celebrated of which was the Song of Roland.

Much interesting talk about the words and music of Roland's Song followed, and then Dr. Mackenzie dealt with the habit prevalent in those (and other) times of singing secular words to sacred tunes and sacred words to secular tunes; and spoke of the growing love for worldly music—which, as the edicts of church councils showed, churchmen tried hard to suppress. The work of Alfred the Great was warmly acknowledged—"he did for England," said Dr. Mackenzie, "what Charlemagne did for Germany and France." At this point the lecturer dealt at some length with the early efforts of musicians to create a system of musical notation, and referred to the work accomplished in this and other directions by Hucbald, Guido, and Franco. A description of the early attempts at harmony and counterpoint, the invention of mensural notation, and the laws of descant, with the habits of singers in extemporising and ornamenting, brought the Lecture to a close.

The second Wednesday was devoted to the rise and progress of secular music among the bards, wandering minstrels, gleemen, &c. The difference between these various types was explained very clearly, and the names were given of the instruments which they used to accompany their songs. The epoch of the troubadours was divided into three periods—their rise (1090 to 1140), their golden age (1140 to 1250), and their decline (1250 to 1290). Examples were given of their songs and poems, and their vast influence on literature and music was described in fitting terms. The effect, on European taste, of Eastern influences, consequent upon the Crusades, was pointed out, and a sketch was given of the various causes by which all these disseminators of "sweetness and light" fell into ill repute.

It was then shown how some of them, settling in various parts of Europe, began to try and improve their skill and refine their taste, and how, from this, musical guilds were gradually formed. Dr. Mackenzie here spoke with some warmth of the eventual failure of Edward the Fourth's attempt to enrol musicians under a charter, characterising it as one of the greatest calamities that had ever befallen music in England. He gave also an interesting account of his own apprenticeship, in his tenth year, to an official, the establishment of whose office dated from the fifteenth century, namely, the "Stadt-musiker," or Town Musician—in this case, Herr Bartel. The Meistersingers next received attention, Dr. Mackenzie describing their efforts to counteract the "latitude and license" of the previous period as a combination of "pedantry and piety." An exceedingly droll account was given of the rules of the Meistersingers, and a most interesting parallel drawn between their competitive examinations and those of the Welsh Eisteddfodau. The Lecture concluded with a sympathetic account of the life and labours of Hans Sachs.

In his third Lecture Dr. Mackenzie traced the progress of counterpoint in Europe from the thirteenth to the beginning of the sixteenth century. His facts, of course, were not new, but they were presented so concisely, grouped with so strong an insight into essentials, and commented upon with such freedom from pedantry and so much humour and practical common-sense that even listeners to whom they were quite familiar took away new thoughts. It was, for instance, delightfully refreshing to hear a Principal of the Royal Academy of Music make fun of the musicians who, in early days, regarded ingenuity and the accumulation of difficulties as the end of art. The "academic influence" may indeed be spoken of as having undergone a "transformation," when it is possible to hear statements like these delivered from a rostrum that only a few years ago was regarded as the head-centre of musical pedantry. Dr. Mackenzie's concluding Lecture took place too late for notice in our present issue.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The first Students' Concert of the present term was given—not at Alexandra House as hitherto, but in the temporary concert-room attached to the new building which is now the home of the pupils of the College—on the afternoon of the 17th ult. Brahms's Sextet in G, one of his masterpieces of chamber music, headed the programme, and was excellently played by six of the pupils, equally divided between the sexes, with Miss Marie Motto at the head. For accuracy and intelligence the reading was admirable; a little more vigour here and there was all that was lacking. Two Romances for oboe and pianoforte, by Schumann, showed that Mr. Percy Rowe is acquiring a thorough command of his instrument, and the accompaniment of Miss Gwendolyn Toms was perfect. Two new songs by R. H. Walthew, lately a pupil at the College, to words from Tennyson's "Songs of the Wrens," were charmingly fresh and melodious, and were well sung by Mr. Winsloe Hall. An exceedingly pretty duet, "Viens," by Saint-Saëns, received an excellent rendering from Miss Ena Bedford and Mr. Edward G. Cleather. A very delightful Concert concluded with Beethoven's Clarinet Trio, thoroughly well rendered by Mr. G. Anderson (clarinet), Miss Maud Branwell (pianoforte), and Miss E. Smith (violoncello).

TONIC SOL-FA CONFERENCE AT SHEFFIELD.

Much excellent work was done during the three days' National Conference of Tonic Sol-faists, held from the 4th to the 6th ult., at Sheffield. Mr. J. S. Curwen's paper on "School Music at Home and Abroad," the result of his experiences of the school music in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, the United States and Canada, although flattering to our achievements, also pointed out several deficiencies in our systems and possible future evil consequences from present procedures. Mr. Curwen considered that whilst singing should be taught by the ordinary school teacher, it was well to also have a visiting superintendent, as these officials were able to correct inadvisable methods and to give valuable hints and help to the ordinary teacher. To guard against the danger of school singing degenerating into the preparation of mechanical tests for the inspector's examination, he urged that the children be taught music as an art. Mr. McNaught gave an instructive model lesson, selecting as his topics for treatment six-pulse measure or six-eight time, beating twice; the study of transition, or change of key by bridge notes; and methods of giving ear exercises to classes. On all these subjects admirable explanations were given, the practical value of which were excellently shown by the intelligent responses of the class summoned for the occasion. In his paper on "Music in Secondary Schools," Mr. McNaught complained that the subject in these institutions was practically neglected. By secondary schools the lecturer meant any school not under Government inspection—viz., public schools, high schools, endowed schools, grammar schools, kindergarten and other preparatory schools, of which there were about 12,000. The neglect of the subject was attributed to music being regarded as meaning the study of the pianoforte. As the work of an ordinary teacher would not, as a rule, allow time for the study of this instrument, let alone for the study of the art of teaching it, the whole subject of music was generally omitted from the curriculum. Herein lay the great difference between the primary and secondary school teacher. The former was trained for years, and most of the training was in practical music, the foundation of which was the study of singing. In girls' schools the music was generally in the hands of a pianoforte teacher, and if there were any class singing practised at all it was vague in aim and miserable in result. It was surprising that secondary schools had not more generally availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Tonic Sol-fa system. It offered a plain presentation of the first principles of music in a form a child could quickly assimilate. Tonic Sol-faists should plead for the care of the juniors. Such a course would be no humbling of pride, for they would merely stoop to conquer.

Mrs. Emil Behnke's paper on "The Voice" touched upon many matters of importance to singers, and if it convinced some young vocalists that, as she happily expressed it, "singing was a higher development of speaking," and so impressed them with the importance of cultivating clear articulation, the discourse will not have been in vain.

Dr. Ralph Dunstan read a thoughtful paper on "Hints to Young Composers," in which he contended that, notwithstanding the large increase of composers, there was still room for originality and creative power. The number of creative composers must necessarily be few, but the number of imitative composers might be legion. Most musically-endowed persons could learn to compose up to a certain fair standard of efficiency and success if they would take pains. There was a market for compositions of fair average merit, but composers should do their very best in whatever they might undertake. He believed musical mediocrity was doomed, and the future musician must be thoroughly equipped if he would gain satisfactory recognition. He considered the Tonic Sol-fa system had produced the most successful teachers of vocal music the world had ever seen, and their influence had been far-reaching and permanent. There was, however, much to be done before England would reach the musical level of Germany. Among many people there was a strong disposition to regard music merely as an amusement and recreation, and not as an education. He contended, however, that the training of the ear, the fingers, and the perceptions was education of the highest order and value.

Mr. Henry Coward discoursed upon the Tonic Sol-fa in relation to harmony, composition, and orchestration, and upon the suitability of the system to the higher branches of music. He gave a brief sketch of his method of teaching harmony, which was commenced by analysis and was largely dependent on studying the works of the best composers. He claimed many advantages for the Tonic Sol-fa system, particularly with relation to the scale, which he said he regarded as a thing of nature, in the sense that it was so formed as to elicit a sympathetic response from the soul of man, just as the colours of the rainbow affected the emotions through the eye.

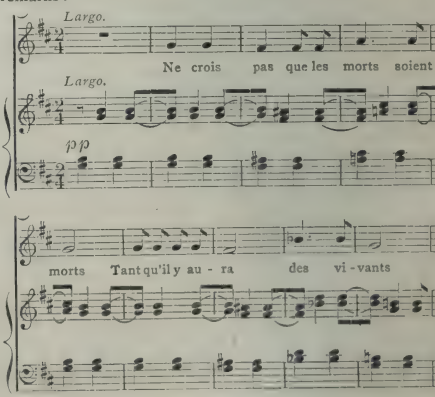
During the congress Mr. Coward's cantata "The King's Error," written for and produced at the Tonic Sol-fa Festival at the Crystal Palace in July last, was excellently performed, the solos being effectively sung by Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. J. Gawthrop, and Mr. Robert Grice.

The following description recently given of a performance of one of Mozart's sonatas presents a somewhat distracting musical problem: "The final movement, given on three pianofortes, by the doubling of one of the parts without disturbing the balance of the whole produced a splendid effect."

REVIEWS.

Les Chansons de Miarka. Poêmes de Jean Richepin. Musique de Alexandre Georges. [Paris: Enoch Frères.]

These very French and very interesting songs are settings of the beautiful lyrics in Richepin's romance "Miarka, la Fille à l'Ourse." The composer's name is unfamiliar to English ears, and we are, therefore, all the more earnest in calling attention to his work, as a lesson to our native composers of the second rank. Generally it may be said that whatever the English second-rate composer writes—organ piece, pianoforte piece, ballad, or waltz—is a hymn tune very thinly disguised, and thus differs in toto from the work of the French composer, which is never in solid harmony and never square at the joints. How Frenchmen learn that admirable reticence which enables them to write an effective and original pianoforte accompaniment with only one note at a time in each hand is to us a mystery, but the result is that their simplest songs have a distinction of colour to which we never attain. These remarks are particularly applicable to the work now under review. All the fourteen numbers of the set are interesting because individual; they are by no means all good, but they are all different, whereas in a set of songs by a German or English writer (except the very highest) you rarely find more than two or three types. The second, "Hymne au soleil," is extremely daring in the harmony and effective in character—a kind of free recitative. No. 6, "L'eau qui court," is more like Massenet than anybody, simple and suave. No. 8, "Nuages," with a monotonous accompaniment, works up very dramatically, but is rather long. No. 10, "La Pluie," with a pretty figure, suggestive of pattering rain, is very agreeable; but No. 11, "Hymne des Morts," which has some original, but not extravagant harmonies, is perhaps the most striking. A few of the opening bars will serve to illustrate and enforce our earlier remarks:—



Organ Arrangements. By John B. Lott and C. Charlton Palmer. Nos. 1-14. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The two musicians responsible for these arrangements are respectively organist and assistant-organist of Lichfield Cathedral, and their credentials are consequently ample as editors of a new series of transcriptions for the "king of instruments." The question is often asked why choral, orchestral, or pianoforte music should be arranged for the organ, as the instrument possesses a large and increasing repertory belonging peculiarly to itself; but the ready answer is that the capabilities and varieties of the organ are so extensive that compositions of almost every sort can be made effective upon it by judicious manipulation. The present series exemplifies this in a significant degree. Messrs. Lott and Palmer do not act on the supposition that all organists have four-manual instruments at command, and are capable of executing passages of exceptional difficulty, the work for manuals and pedals being carefully distributed, and the suggestions for registration at once moderate and artistic. Among the movements included are Dr. Mackenzie's favourite "Benedictus," originally written for violin; No. 6 of Schubert's "Moments Musicals," the Andante from the same composer's Quartet in C, the slow movements from Beethoven's second and fourth Pianoforte Sonatas, No. 2 of Schumann's "Sketches for a Pedal Pianoforte," and other selections by Haydn, Handel, Mozart, Weber, Kuhlau, H. Hofmann, Oliver King, and W. Noel Johnson, all being within the scope of ordinarily competent executants, and not unsuitable as church voluntaries.

Eight Fugues from Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord. With analytical exposition in colours and appended harmonic schemes. Second Series. By Bern. Boekelman. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Four or five years ago Mr. Boekelman won the approval of many eminent musicians in Europe and America for the ingenious idea which here receives a further exemplification. He published eight of Bach's Fugues, the Subjects, Countersubjects, Answers, Episodes, &c., of which were printed in different colours—the characteristic colour of each being retained throughout. The advantages of this innovation were obvious at first sight, and we are rather surprised that a second series has not appeared earlier, and indeed that Mr. Boekelman has not seen fit to draw up a complete edition of Bach's immortal "48" on the same plan. This, no doubt, will come in time. At present we are called upon to draw attention to a further selection from the Fugues —i.e., Nos. 2, 5, 6, and 16 from Vol. I., and Nos. 1, 2, 11, and 12 from Vol: II. These, as every lover of Bach well knows, are among the "favourites," and their publication in this form will probably gain them an entrée into circles where "fugues" are usually regarded with a certain amount of suspicion. To students, of whatever age, this edition must be most acceptable. In addition to the clearness gained by the exhibition in colours of the various constituents of the Fugues, each is accompanied by a chart (in musical notation) of its harmonic structure, with a letterpress analysis and a concise explanation of fugal structure generally.

Technical Studies. Material for practising. Vol. I. Exercises in counterpoint in two parts, with the hands immovable and moving. Vol. II. Change of fingers with interrupted and uninterrupted tone repetition and with double notes. By Hermann Vetter, Professor at the Royal Conservatorium of Music, Dresden. [Leipzig: Friedrich Hofmeister.]

The method here expounded is well worthy of the attention of pianoforte teachers, the exercises being admirably calculated to develop that independent action of the hands and fingers which so frequently presents a formidable difficulty to the student. They also have the merit in execution of necessitating the constant attention of the player, upon which satisfactory results so very greatly depend.

Short Settings of the Holy Communion. Nos. 28 and 29. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these is from the pen of the Rev. E. V. Hall, late Precentor of Worcester Cathedral, who also supplied No. 14 of the series. The present setting is in the key of E flat. It does not contain any special characteristics to which attention should be directed, being simple and devotional throughout, the harmonic progressions almost purely diatonic and the accompaniment strictly following the voice parts, without florid diversions. No. 29 is the composition of G. F. Wesley Martin and is also in E flat. It is decidedly bolder and freer in style, with a fair infusion of chromatic chords and independent phrases in the accompaniment. But it is by no means unchurchlike, though the composer is not always correct in matters of accent. For example, in the sentence "Being of one substance," the stress should be laid on the penultimate word; only those, however, who are versed in ecclesiastical lore are likely to notice points of this nature.

The Morning and Evening Service, with the Holy Communion, in B major. By B. Luard Selby. The same in G. By Edmondstoune Duncan (Op. 21).

Communion Service in E. By Alfred S. Baker. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

New Service music increases and multiplies to such an extent that it is almost impossible to keep pace with it; but the three settings above-named deserve passing mention, though for divergent reasons. Mr. Luard Selby shows some boldness in selecting the key of five sharps; but now that organs are universally tuned to equal temperament all keys are available. A glance at his Service, which occupies fifty-six pages in vocal score, shows that he intended it for festival occasions. It is remarkable not so much for elaboration as for general boldness and modern feeling, and the organ accompaniment might well be transcribed for orchestra. There are some peculiarities—for example, the close of the Te Deum on the dominant—and throughout the composer proves that he can think for himself and knows how to express his thoughts. Mr. Edmondstoune Duncan's Service is, generally speaking, of a quieter nature, though discursive in respect of tonality, for the music wanders into remote flat keys for a few bars at a time. There is no regular fugue, but the fugal passages indicate that Mr. Duncan is an excellent contrapuntist. Mr. Baker's setting of the Communion Office in E commences with a Kyrie in D flat, and this prepares us for what is to come, for there are many key transitions which would otherwise be startling. But there is a feeling of high-class musicianship throughout, and the composer may be encouraged to persevere in his art, for his ability is above the average.

Album of Songs. Nos. 1 and 2. Composed by Arthur Patton. Edited by J. Maude Crament. [Forsyth Brothers.]

These contain eight songs, the words of which have been selected from well-known sources. The settings are simple, but the majority require a higher voice than is common amongst the class of vocalists to whom they will mostly appeal. Mr. Patton is most successful in the second song of the second book, in which the quaint grace of Robert Herrick's words is happily echoed by the music.

Irish Melodies. Arranged as Pianoforte Duets. By Oliver King. Op. 41. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This Album consists of twelve pieces, but contains sixteen melodies, for in three instances two melodies are combined in the same piece, contrapuntally. Thus, in No. 4, "The bunch of green rushes" is heard in the treble, while "The Minstrel Boy" is being played in the bass; in No. 6, "Thady, you gander," "The pretty girl of Derby, O!" and "Garryowen" are combined; and in No. 7, "The last rose of Summer" is accompanied above by "Aileen Aroon," perhaps better known as "Robin Adair." The polyphonic character of these pieces is, however, not confined to the numbers containing more than one melody. "St. Patrick's Day," "The pretty girl milking her cow," "Savourneen Deelish," "An Cnuicin Fraoigh," and other tunes are treated with remarkable ingenuity and humour. The question whether such complex treatment suits the nature of these melodies is one upon which difference of opinion may be allowed. None, however, can exist with regard to the skill shown in their arrangement. It should be stated that these pieces are not suited for fledglings. None but experienced players could be expected to do justice to their effects or to phrase them properly.

Six Marches. By Franz Schubert. Arranged for Violin and Pianoforte by Siegfried Jacoby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Five of these are from the Marches for Pianoforte Duet, and comprise the best known and most "taking" numbers; the sixth is the magnificent march from the Hungarian Divertissement, one of Schubert's noblest inspirations. It is, we hope, unnecessary to say one word in commendation of these beautiful pieces. In whatever form they appear they are delightful to play and to hear. Mr. Jacoby's arrangements present no executive difficulties that need affright even the humble amateur.

Octavo Edition of Two-part Songs for female voices. Nos. 62-91. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Here we have thirty new numbers of a publication commenced not long since, and more direct evidence that it has supplied a distinct want could not be needed. It is clearly impossible to describe in detail each of these little pieces, within reasonable space, but attention may be drawn to a few of them as samples of the remainder. Some are reprints of old favourites, such as Horn's "I know a bank" and duets by Mendelssohn, Abt, Smart, Schumann, and other composers. Nos. 77-86 consist of ten very pretty little compositions by Karel Bendl (Op. 104). In these the effect is much enhanced by the piquant accompaniments. The contributions of Gilbert R. Betjemann, Myles B. Foster, and Ethel Boyce may also be warmly praised for their daintiness and grace.

Clavierstücke. Componirt von Leo Schrattenholz. [Berlin: Ries and Erler.]

Cultured pianists will enjoy playing these artistic little pieces, which are twelve in number, well diversified in character, and for the most part possessing great musical charm.

The Shepherd's call. For string orchestra and horn in F (ad lib.). Op. 43. By Herbert Bunning. [Louis Oertel.]

This presents a pleasing pastoral picture, in which, to quote the heading of the music, "the calm of evening is broken by the shepherd's melancholy call," the said call being given to the horn. It is short, simply written for all the instruments, which are well balanced, and would admirably serve as an intermezzo at dramatic performances or recitations.

The Canticles of the Church. Set to Chants by well-known Composers, with varied harmonies. Benedicite, for chorus and organ; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, set to irregular Chants in G. By J. T. Field. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Field is no novice in Church composition, but he has hit upon a novel idea in the first of the above-named publications. The familiar chants by Cooke, Jacobs, Turle, &c., are cleverly treated, and the setting will be warmly welcomed by organists who have no natural gift for varying simple tunes. The Benedicite is in varied chant form, the usual triple measure being adopted, and is one of the most effective settings of this Canticle within our knowledge. As the Benedicite is now in regular use in place of the Te Deum on certain days of the year, Mr. Field's version should be warmly welcomed. The Evening Service is in solid four-part harmony, and is noteworthy alike for pleasing expression and Church-like dignity.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—At a Subscription Concert in the new Concert House, on September 27, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's fine orchestral ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci" was performed, under the direction of Mynheer Kes. The programme also included Brahms's first Symphony, the Prelude to Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel," a Rhapsody by Lalo, &c.

Antwerp.—Weber's beautiful, but rarely heard opera "Euryanthe" was recently performed at the Flemish Theatre, under the direction of M. Kuervels.——At the Exhibition Herr Felix Mottl conducted a grand Wagner Concert, before an enormous and enthusiastic audience. M. Van Dyck was the soloist, and sang extracts from "Lohengrin," "Die Walküre," and "Die Meistersinger."

Barmen.—On September 25 the well-known firm of pianoforte manufacturers, Rudolph Ibach Sohn, celebrated the centenary of its foundation.——A new Oratorio by Max Bruch will be produced here during the current month, under the direction of the composer. Mynheer Messchart, of Amsterdam, will create the chief rôle.

Bayreuth.—There are rumours of Madame Cosima Wagner having already engaged the brothers De Reszké for the performances of the "Nibelung's Ring" at the Festspielhaus in 1896, and that these two superb singers are already learning German, which they at present speak only with difficulty. Frau Rosa Sucher will very likely be Brünnhilde and Hans Richter, Conductor.

Berlin.—On September 22 Professor Xaver Scharwenka produced his opera "Mataswintha," at the Krollscher Saal, before an invited audience, and without scenic accessories or choruses. The libretto, by Ernst Koppel, is founded on Felix Dahn's celebrated novel "Ein Kampf um Rom" ("A Fight for Rome"). The music, as was to be expected, is thoroughly modern in style, Wagner's "Tristan" having evidently served the composer as a model of what a present day opera should be. As far as could be judged in the absence of all action and scenery, the score contains some striking beauties, especially in the important work allotted to the orchestra.——At her Pianoforte Recital, on the 12th ult., Frau Gisella Göllerich-Voigt, a pupil of Volkmann and Liszt, played two hitherto unknown compositions by the latter master — viz., "Gebet" (Prayer) and "La Notte" (ode after Michael Angelo). Liszt presented the manuscript of these pieces to the pianist's husband, Herr August Göllerich, in Nuremberg.——The Wagner Society will give four Concerts during the coming winter with the increased Philharmonic orchestra. Three of them will be conducted by Professor Karl Klindworth, while the youngest of the travelling conductors, Herr Siegfried Wagner, will wield the bâton at the fourth Concert. Frau Lilli Lehmann, Frau Herzog, Herr Franz Betz, Herr Eugen d'Albert, and other first-rate artists have been engaged, and the production of works by young composers of modern tendencies will be made a special feature.——It is stated that Madame Etelka Gerster intends opening a school of singing at her Italian country seat near Bologna. There will also be a small stage on which her pupils can perform selections from operas.——Madame Berthe Marx-Goldschmidt, who is better known in London than here, will give a cycle of eight Pianoforte Recitals in the Bechstein Saal. The programmes are of quite unusual interest, especially that of the last Concert, which contains only works by modern French, German, and Russian composers.——Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" met with a most enthusiastic reception on its first performance at the Court Theatre. The Emperor and Empress were present and expressed to the composer the great pleasure which they had derived from his beautiful work.——A successful Concert was given in the Philharmonie by Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Tivadar Nachèz, and Mr. Algernon Ashton. The distinguished tenor and violinist were repeatedly recalled by the audience, amongst whom were several musicians of note. Mr. Ashton's compositions were also much appreciated.

Bremen.—Professor A. R. Grote is the composer of a new comic opera, entitled "Prinz Rosa Stramin," which was produced at the Town Theatre, on the 3rd ult., and was favourably received.

Brussels.—There will be no lack of interesting Concerts during the current season, for besides the four given by the Conservatoire, and the series of six others under M. Joseph Dupont, all the travelling conductors at present in fashion—viz., Felix Mottl, Hermann Levi, Richard Strauss, and Hans Richter, as well as Mynheer Kes from Amsterdam —will direct Symphony Concerts.

Budapest.—The municipality has granted a yearly subvention of 3,000 Austrian florins to the local Philharmonic Society.

Coburg.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Coburg conferred upon Madame Lillian Nordica the Cross of the Order of Merit for Art and Science after she had sung the part of Elsa in "Lohengrin," at the Court Theatre, on the 15th ult.

Crimmitschau.—Herr Ed. Henssge, the local town "Kantor," is reported to have made a highly interesting discovery in the several centuries old Kantoreigesellschaft. It is nothing less than the MS. of a hitherto unknown work of the great Johann Sebastian Bach, which that master composed àpropos of the inauguration of a church at Störmthal, near Leipzig. The MS. is in Bach's autograph, and the piece is laid out for three oboes, two violins, viola, and four voci con Organo et Basso. Herr Henssge is also the owner of an old copy of another work by Bach, which is said never to have been published. It is a cantata: "Sei willkommen, Du mächtiger Herrscher," for two horns, two oboes, two violins, viola, and four voci con Fondamento.

Dessau.—On September 20 the combined Singakademie and Theatre chorus, under Court-conductor Klughardt, gave a very good performance of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," which work seems to be steadily growing in favour in Germany, both on the stage and in the concert-room.

Dresden.—M. Ambroise Thomas's opera "Hamlet" was performed, for the first time, at the Court Theatre, on September 16, with Fräulein Teleky as Ophelia and Herr Perron in the title rôle. The twenty-five-year-old "novelty" was warmly received, and the performance was excellent. ——Two new operas, the two-act "Ingrid" and the one-act "Irrlicht," both by Carl Grammann, were recently produced at the Court Theatre. Of the two works the shorter met with the greater applause, but neither opera seems likely to make a stir in the musical world.

Frankfort-on-Main.—The Museums-Gesellschaft will, during the coming winter, inaugurate a series of ten high-class Orchestral Concerts on Sundays, at which some of the foremost soloists of the day will appear. The orchestra, under Kapellmeister Kogel, will consist of seventy-five players, the nucleus being formed by the Homburg Kurkapelle. An admirable set of programmes has been drawn up, the number of modern works being especially notable. The price of a season ticket for the ten Concerts is only fifteen marks, while single tickets cost two marks. Besides this new enterprise there will be the usual Friday Concerts and the Opera-house Orchestral Concerts, both series with capital programmes. —— Professor Julius Stockhausen, who has been suffering from cataract in one of his eyes, recently underwent an operation which was completely successful. The veteran singer is now in excellent health and has resumed his teaching.

Ghent.—On the 5th ult. M. Saint-Saëns's opéra comique "Phryné" was performed, for the first time in Belgium, at the Grand Theatre, and was well received.

Hamburg.—On September 16 Herr Pollini celebrated the twentieth anniversary of the opening of the rebuilt Town Theatre, as well as of his assumption of the directorship of this temple of the muses, by a performance of "Lohengrin," which opera was also played on the opening night two decades ago. The performance of September 16 was also the 250th performance of Wagner's glorious work at the Town Theatre. —— The delightful fairy opera "Hänsel und Gretel," by Humperdinck, was performed for the first time at the Town Theatre on September 25, and achieved as emphatic a success as it has done wherever else this striking protest of German Idealism against Italian and French Realism has been heard.——The Philharmonic Society, which will shortly celebrate the seventieth anniversary of its foundation, has just chosen a new Conductor in place of Herr von Bernuth, retired. He is Professor Richard Barth, a violin virtuoso, who has for some time been Universitätsmusik-Direktor at Marburg.

Ischl (Tyrol).—On September 22 two new Sonatas for clarinet and pianoforte, by Johannes Brahms, were performed for the first time before the Duke of Meiningen and his consort, Frau von Heldburg, who are staying at their Villa Soletalp, on the Königsee. The works, which are in the keys of F minor and E flat major respectively, were played by the famous clarinetist, Mühlfeld, and the composer. They are said to be very beautiful and likely to make a sensation in musical circles. May they be worthy successors to the famous Clarinet Quintet of the same master!

Leipzig.—Herr Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" has now found its way to the Town Theatre, where it was given for the first time on September 21 with the greatest success. The performance was, on the whole, excellent; the principal characters having been played by Fräulein Osborne (Hänsel), Fräulein Kernic (Gretel), and Herr Schelper (Father Peter), while the part of the Witch was appropriately given to the lady rejoicing in the euphonious name of Krzyzanowski-Doxat. There is, after all, a great deal in such a name!

Lille.—"Samson et Dalila," M. Saint-Saëns's dramatic chef d'œuvre, was given for the first time in this town on the 4th ult.

Milan.—On September 22 Signor Sonzogno's new Teatro Lirico Internazionale, a fine and luxuriously fitted building, was opened with much ceremony. First, there was a Prologue, which the impatient public refused to listen to, and finally drowned with yells and whistling. Then came the new opera "Martire," by the Greek composer, Spiro Samara, a perfect type of what we lately styled "bill-poster opera." The action takes place at Sulina, at the mouth of the Danube. The heroine (the Martyr) is the wife of a merchant, Tristano (O! shade of Wagner!), who falls in love with a French music hall singer, a sweet thing called Nina Fleurette. Nina is accompanied by an Italian tenor, Baciacieli, and a German virtuoso answering to the name of Chrysostome (!) Weischeit. It will be easily imagined what delightfully "modern" complications arise, and how the fun waxes fast and furious when the "hero," Tristano, accuses his wife publicly with having carried on amorous intrigues with a pilot, Mikael Taucich. The lady strongly objects to this washing of dirty linen in public, and as she has good reason for arguing that her dear husband should be the last person to throw stones at her, she makes up her mind to become a martyr. So she retires into her house, but only to re-appear directly, armed with a charcoal stove. Then follows the scene of the opera: the heroine inhales the fumes of the charcoal fire and gets asphyxiated coram publico! This is the sort of stuff that young Italy, and, we suppose we must now add, young Greece, weds to music—and such music! Delibes's ballet "Coppélia" followed the opera, and we can well believe that the lamented French master's delightful work seemed quite an exquisite work of art after Samara's precious "Martyr."

Munich.—On September 22 the Court Theatre gave a performance of Wagner's "Rheingold," to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the production of the work. Of the artists who took part in the memorable first performance, only one—viz., Herr Vogel—sang his original part (Loge) on the occasion under notice.——The recent cycle of Wagner performances was such a great success that the directors of the Court Theatre intend giving another next year, at which the master's early opera, "Das Liebesverbot, oder Die Novize von Palermo," will be performed. This work, which is founded on Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," has only been given once—namely, on March 29, 1836, at Magdeburg, where Wagner was Conductor at the Town Theatre. A second performance for the composer's benefit was duly announced, but, to quote Mr. Dannreuther, "it collapsed ere the curtain could rise—few people in the auditorium, and a free fight behind the scenes." The forthcoming cycle will include all the master's stage works except "Parsifal."

Nuremberg.—Under the presidency of Burgomaster von Schuh, a "Society for holding Bavarian Musical Festivals" has just been formed here. The first Festival will take place in 1896, in connection with a Nuremberg Exhibition.

Paris.—The great event of the autumn season, the first performance of Verdi's "Othello" at the Grand Opéra, in the presence of the composer, took place on the 12th ult. It was one of those gala nights, when everybody who is anybody is to be found inside the magnificent building to do homage to the genius of a great master. The President of the Republic was present in his box on the second tier, and after the first Act he invested the aged Maëstro with the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour, whereupon Verdi, from the front of the box, bowed his acknowledgment to the enthusiastic applause of the audience. The performance, conducted by M. Taffanel, and with Madame Rose Caron as Desdemona, M. Saléza as Othello, and M. Maurel as Iago, was one of great excellence, and the success of the fine work complete and emphatic. The French translation of Signor Boito's poem is by M. Camille du Locle and the author. Shakespeare's name is not even mentioned on the French score or libretto.——A Mass for the repose of the soul of the late Charles Gounod was celebrated at the Madeleine Church on the 17th ult., the first anniversary of the master's death. Signor Verdi was present, the lunch given in his honour by the President of the Republic having been postponed so as to enable the author of "Othello" to assist at the function. Gounod's "Missa pro Mortuis," a posthumous work, and some numbers from his "Mors et Vita," were sung by artists of the Opéra and Opéra Comique, as well as his swan's song, the "Repentir." The solemn service was deeply impressive, and the church was crowded with worshippers, amongst whom were many notabilities.——Mdlle. Nikita, the much-advertised young American prima donna, recently made her début at the Opéra Comique in "Mignon," without, however, making any particular impression. Some of the critics have, in fact, gone so far as to call her pronunciation deplorable, her method very defective, and her singing altogether devoid of style.——Signor Leoncavallo and M. Catulle Mendès are having a pretty quarrel. The French author has charged the Italian composer with having borrowed the plot of the successful opera "I Pagliacci" from his play "La Femme de Tabarin," whereas Signor Leoncavallo, in a letter to his publisher, Sonzogno, assures that gentleman, on his word of honour, that he had never read or seen the play in question; that he founded his plot on a tragedy in real life which occurred in his native village of Montalto in Calabria, when he was a boy, and which made an unusually deep impression on his young mind because his father had to sit in judgment over the wretched husband who in a fit of jealousy murdered his wife after a public performance. M. Mendès is not satisfied with this explanation, and the case is to be taken up by the "Société des auteurs dramatiques."——M. Homolle, the director of the French School of Archæology at Athens, announces the recent discovery of two more pieces of Greek music. One of them will most likely create even greater interest than the "Hymn to Apollo," found last year, because it contains musical signs for the instrumental accompaniment, and the vexed question may perhaps be settled at last, what the Greeks knew of, and how they used, harmony. The new piece is also a song of praise to Apollo; the god's birth in the Island of Delos and his slaying of the Python are referred to, and it also contains a prayer for the city of Athens and the Romans. The latter circumstance approximately fixes the date of the origin of the Hymn; M. Homolle thinks it must have been composed towards the end of the second century. The Hymn is carved on one slab of marble and is in such excellent preservation that M. Homolle promises an all but complete transcription of the text and music.——M. Alfred Bruneau, the composer of the beautiful opera "L'Attaque du Moulin," is at present engaged on a new work to a libretto written by M. Zola.

Vienna.—Frau Materna has returned to the Court Opera, and was enthusiastically welcomed on her re-appearance in the character of Selica, in Meyerbeer's "Africaine."——Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" was revived on September 22, after it had been put aside for exactly twenty years. The performers, amongst whom were Herren Reichmann, Winkelmann, and Grengg, were much applauded, but the work seemed hardly to the taste of the audience. The delectable "Cavalleria" is relished much more by the Viennese.——Herr Van Dyck, the famous tenor, has finished his contract with the Court Opera, and will settle in Paris.——Nearly a whole week was devoted to the due celebration of Johann Strauss's Jubilee, the fiftieth anniversary of the waltz king's début. It included a reception at his residence; a Concert at the Academy of Music; a grand banquet; the production, at the Theatre an der Wien, of his latest operetta, "Jabuka, or the Apple Feast," which was received with tumultuous applause; and the first performance, at the Court Theatre, of a new ballet, "Round about Vienna," by Bayer, in which some of Strauss's most fascinating dances are introduced.

Warsaw.—On the 14th ult. the monument erected to Chopin, at his birthplace, Zelazowa Wola, was unveiled.

Wiesbaden.—The new Court Theatre, a magnificent structure which accommodates 1,400 persons, and boasts of an enormous stage, was opened on the 16th ult., in the presence of the Emperor.

Zwickau. — Liszt's rarely-heard Graner Messe was recently performed by the combined choirs of St. Mary's Church and the Acapella-Verein, under the direction of Musikdirektor Vollhardt. The performance of the noble work was excellent, especially as regards the chorus.

Miss Ethel Russell is the winner of the free scholarship awarded by the Cheshire County Council, giving three years' instruction in singing at the Royal Manchester College of Music. This is the first free scholarship awarded at that College.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

The musical season here may be said to have set in with the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, who gave a week's performances, beginning on September 17. The personnel of the company has undergone some changes since its last appearance here, and possibly, on the whole, the alterations were not improvements. The list of operas presented was "Tannhäuser," "The Daughter of the Regiment," "Romeo and Juliet," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "I Pagliacci," "Lohengrin," "Maritana," and "Il Trovatore." The business, I am sorry to say, suffered through the absence of some familiar favourites, but the operas were rendered with the care associated with all that the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company does.

The musical outlook promises to be bright. Apart from an operatic wave, which we hope will be something more than passing—I refer to the performances of two local operatic societies—our principal musical society, the Belfast Philharmonic Society, announces for the season four Subscription Concerts, in addition to its annual Christmas Concert. For the first, Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. Edwin Houghton, and Mr. Plunket Greene, with Miss Pauline Sant Angelo (pianoforte) and Mr. Willy Hess (violin), have been engaged. The work to be performed is Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's work, "The New Covenant." On the 23rd inst. Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" will be given, with Madame Emily Spada (soprano), Miss Dews (contralto), Mr. Philip Newbury (tenor), and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint (baritone). For the third Subscription Concert a miscellaneous selection will be given, assisted by the Meistersingers Quartet and Miss Alice Gomez, with Mr. Leonard Borwick (solo pianoforte) and Miss Eldina Bligh (violin). The fourth and last Concert promises to bring the season to a brilliant close with Mendelssohn's "Elijah," for which Mr. Andrew Black has been engaged. The soprano music will be taken by Madame Bertha Moore, the contralto by Madame Marie Hooton, and the tenor by Mr. Edward Branscombe. On the 16th inst. we are promised a visit from Mr. Joseph Slivinski, the great Polish pianist, and Miss Curnow, in a miscellaneous Concert.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

Concerts in Bristol are becoming more numerous, but up to the present they have almost all been of the miscellaneous order. No choral performances of importance have taken place, but happily the two largest bodies and the numerous district and parochial societies are rehearsing works to be publicly presented later on. It is gratifying to know that the Saturday Popular Concerts are being continued, but now a dozen vocalists take the place of the choir, which have been dispensed with on the ground of economy. Unfortunately, the public support is not always adequate; but the actual financial results can only be learned at the close of the season. At the 102nd Concert, on the 20th ult., the principal singers were Miss Clara Dowle and Mr. Harper Kearton; the select choir of twelve voices contributed part-songs, glees, &c.; Miss Marianne Eissler played violin solos, and the orchestra performed overtures and selections.

A Concert was given under the direction of Mr. Riseley on September 25, when Miss Marie Gane, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Mr. E. T. Morgan sang, and Miss Maud Riseley and Mr. Van Gelder contributed violin and violoncello solos respectively.

Sir Charles and Lady Hallé gave Pianoforte and Violin Recitals here on the 1st ult., on which date also Mr. Augustus Simmons's Concert took place, the singing of a glee party being the chief point of interest in connection therewith.

Mr. Herbert Parsons, a remarkably talented pianist, who received his early training in Clifton, and has since studied at the Conservatorium, Frankfort, gave a highly praiseworthy exhibition of his artistic attainments on the 15th ult., at the Victoria Rooms.

The Concert of Miss Florence Cromey, at the same place, on the 18th ult., was chiefly noteworthy from the fact that some of the best known professional and amateur musicians of the city took part in it. They were Mrs. Pauline L. Day, Misses Clara Aldersley, Dora Blinkhorn, Marion Glass, Amy Lavington, Florence Lane, Mabel Riseley, Maud Riseley, and Rose Thomas; Messrs. Harold Bernard, Percy Lewis, J. L. Roeckel, G. H. Riseley, W. Thomas, and also a male-voice choir. Mr. Geo. Riseley acted as musical director. The various vocal and instrumental solos and concerted pieces were well rendered and afforded gratification to the assemblage.

The weekly, and latterly twice weekly, musical performances at the Clifton Spa continue to be remarkably attractive. They are generally attended by overflowing audiences, despite the fact that the place is a long distance from the city, whence a good many people journey. A few weeks ago an experiment was made by presenting a programme containing compositions only of Sir Arthur Sullivan, and so successful did the venture prove that it has since been repeated with satisfactory results.

The Quintuor Society, comprising Signor Enrico Darmaro (1st violin), Mr. Albert Hall (2nd violin), Mr. John Bevan, jun. (viola), Mr. Percy Lewis (violoncello), and Madame Darmaro (Miss Florence Eyre) (pianoforte), gave its fourth Invitation Concert, at All Saints' Hall, on the 19th ult. The programme included Jadassohn's Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 70) and Mendelssohn's String Quartet (Op. 44, No. 2) in E minor. Fräulein Witting, a young Dresden vocalist, who had not appeared before in England, has a sweet contralto voice. She gave an artistic rendering of Schubert's "Die junge Nonne," Brahms's "Mainacht" and "Minnelied," and songs by Parry, P. Napier Miles, and Henschel.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The list of artists already engaged for the present musical season in Dundee, although full particulars are not yet issued, shows that it will be once more a busy and interesting one.

The Dundee Amateur Choral Union will, as usual, give two Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Carl D. Hamilton. At the first Concert, on December 11, "Elijah" will be performed, with Miss Maggie Davies, Madame Marian McKenzie, and Messrs Henry Piercy and Andrew Black as soloists.

Messrs. Methven, Simpson and Co., in conjunction with Messrs. Harrison, will give their third series of four Subscription Concerts, at which will appear Madame Albani, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Clara Butt, Madame Alice Gomez, Mdlle. Thérèse Gérardy; and Messrs. Santley, Norman Salmond, Popper, Jean Gérardy, Sir Charles Hallé and his orchestra, and many other excellent artists. Messrs. Paterson, Sons and Co. also announce a series of four Subscription Orchestral Concerts, for which they have re-engaged the Scottish Orchestra, with Mr. Henschel as Conductor and Mr. Sons as leader. The programme arrangements are not yet completed, but Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Miss Frida Scotta, and Madame Helen Hopekirk are already secured as soloists. It is to be hoped that these Concerts will have the generous support of the Dundee public, to ensure not only the artistic success, which is certain, but also the pecuniary success they so well deserve.

The Musical Services in St. Paul's Church have attracted large congregations, and Mr. Turner's Organ Recitals have been much appreciated.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A scheme is on foot in Norwich having for its aim the formation of an East Anglian Orchestral Society, the object of the promoters being to enrol all the best professional and amateur talent in the district. It is proposed that local bands should be formed in the most convenient centres in the district, holding independent rehearsals in such centres, and that, periodically, concerts should be given with help from other centres. By this means it is hoped that opportunities will be given to residents in the larger market towns and the immediate neighbourhood for hearing the instrumental works of the great masters interpreted by a full and competent band. Mr. W. Tuddenham, of Norwich, is to be the Conductor, and Mr. H. E. Hurrell, of Great Yarmouth, has undertaken the duties of secretary. In its veteran Philharmonic Society Norwich already possesses a capable band, and if one of a similar character can be utilised for less favoured and smaller centres a great good will have been accomplished. The population of East Anglia (which we take to include Norfolk and Suffolk) undoubtedly includes many instrumentalists of repute, and any effort to bring them on to a common platform deserves every success.——Messrs. Howlett and Son, more ambitious than usual this autumn, arranged to give four grand Concerts on consecutive evenings—September 25, 26, 27, and 28. The large Agricultural Hall was specially fitted up for the occasion, but on several evenings it was far from full. The artists engaged on the first two evenings included Madame Albani, Mdlle. Trebelli, Madame Gomez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Braxton Smith, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Norman Salmond, as vocalists; Mons. E. Sauret (violin), Mr. B. Patterson Parker (violoncello), Mr. J. Thomas (harp), and Mr. F. Watkis (pianoforte). On Thursday the Meister Glee Singers filled the programme, and on Friday the Anglo-Swiss Ladies' Band occupied the evening. Musically the series was highly successful, but although a different class of audience was appealed to on each occasion, four Concerts on following evenings was evidently a larger dose than Norwich people can comfortably swallow.—— On September 24 a very interesting function took place at the Jenny Lind Infirmary for Sick Children, in Norwich, an institution founded many years since by the celebrated lady whose name it bears, and which has been materially helped latterly by Madame Nilsson, Madame Albani, Mr. Santley, and other eminent artists. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt having presented to the Infirmary a terra-cotta replica of the medallion of his wife lately erected in Westminster Abbey, the Governors were invited to be present on the above date to witness its unveiling by the Mayoress (Lady Eade). Taking advantage of Madame Albani's presence in the city, that lady was invited to be present on the interesting occasion, an invitation she readily accepted. During the proceedings three of the Cathedral choristers (Masters Self, White, and Briggs) sang Mendelssohn's trio "Lift your eyes," the principal part of which, it may be remembered, was written for Jenny Lind. At the conclusion of the ceremony Madame Albani sang a verse of "God save the Queen."—— During the summer the various bands connected with the local volunteers and factories play in our public gardens two or three evenings in the week, much to the amusement and gratification of the public; and as a slight recognition of their gratuitous services, several special fêtes are arranged towards the close of the season, when a small charge is made for admission, the sum thus raised being divided amongst the bandsmen. But at the end of this season their services have been more authoritatively recognised, for the happy thought occurred to the Mayor (Sir Peter Eade, M.D.) of inviting the men to dine with him in St. Andrew's Hall, and on the evening of the 5th ult. nearly 300 accepted his worship's invitation. It is to be hoped this graceful act on the part of the municipal head will be followed in the years to come.

Dr. Bunnett's work in connection with the Concerts given bi-weekly at the Pier Concert Room, Lowestoft, was brought to a close on Saturday, September 29. In his reply to a vote of thanks proposed by the Mayor, the worthy doctor informed the audience that forty Concerts had been given since the opening of the season in May, sixty different artists had been heard, thirty operettas (several produced for the first time) and 200 vocal and instrumental pieces had been given. Those who "know" will understand how much trouble and anxiety the superintendence of such a series of entertainments entail, and Dr. Bunnett deserves congratulation for the success which has attended his efforts. The performances of the band of the P.W.O. Artillery, which has played on the Pier during the season, has greatly improved under the conductorship of Mr. Holland.——The musical part of the Harvest Thanksgiving Service at St. Margaret's Church on Thursday evening, September 27, consisted of the first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation," the solos being sung by Mrs. Catchpole, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank. The church choir was strengthened for the occasion by most of the members of the Lowestoft contingent to the Norwich Festival. There was no band, but Mr. H. D. Flowers ably presided at the organ.

The North Walsham Musical Society has commenced its weekly practices; Dr. Parry's "Judith" is the work put into rehearsal. Dr. Horace Hill has been re-elected Conductor.

Mr. P. H. Chignell, Organist of Kirkley Church, Harleston, has been appointed Conductor of the Harleston Musical Society. One of the works chosen for the coming season is Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter."

The winter musical season in Great Yarmouth commenced on September 26 with a visit by the Meister Glee Singers, whose efforts, as usual, were confined to very mediocre selections. Surely a body calling themselves "Glee Singers," endowed with the talent these gentlemen undoubtedly possess, might be expected to include in their programmes some of the grand old glees of which English music is so rich. Miss M. Elliott also sang several songs in good style, and Mr. G. T. Miles was heard with pleasure in some harp solos.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

October has been a very uneventful month in Edinburgh. The only musical event of outstanding importance was the visit of Dr. Richter with his large and splendid orchestra, about which the "notes from the provinces" will be so full that it is only necessary to mention the C minor Symphony, the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, and the Brahms-Haydn Variations as having surpassed the rest of a performance almost unique in Edinburgh. Messrs. Paterson could not have desired a more auspicious opening to their concert season.

Mr. Leonard Borwick came on the 19th ult. to confirm the golden opinions he won last season. He chose Beethoven's Op. 111 as his cheval de bataille, and played also a representative selection from Bach, Scarlatti, Chopin, and Liszt. He was accompanied by a great Edinburgh favourite, Mr. Plunket Greene, who in a selection of songs by Martini, Handel, Franz, and also several Volkslieder increased his high reputation.

A miscellaneous programme, to which, on the 13th ult., the Meister Glee Singers, Mr. Leo Stern, Miss Mabel Berry, and Madame Alice Gomez contributed, attracted to the Empire Theatre an audience which packed the beautiful building. It is a pity we do not have more opportunities of hearing performances outside our wretched Music Hall.

At the end of the month most of the musical organisations were in full swing. Mr. Henschel's orchestra made its first appearance on the 29th ult.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, and Liszt were the composers drawn upon on the evening of the 12th ult., when Dr. Hans Richter again visited Glasgow. Former triumphs of the great Viennese Conductor have not by any means been forgotten; it would, indeed, be more correct to say that the re-appearance of Dr. Richter was regarded as a red-letter record. On the occasion under brief notice the orchestra was in excellent form, and fresh as the members of the band were from their Birmingham successes it will readily be granted that Glasgow amateurs found themselves in rare good luck. That they rose to the occasion goes without saying. St. Andrew's Hall was, moreover, well filled, and the enthusiasm evoked at the conclusion, for example, of "The Ride of the Valkyries" was positively contagious. The contrast with the immediately preceding piece in the programme—the Vorspiel from "Parsifal"—was emphasized beyond praise, and the band was no less successful in the Liszt Rhapsody (No. 2), where the nuances were expressed as they have never been before in this part of the country. But Dr. Richter's crowning achievement was reserved for the final piece on the programme. This was Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and it must suffice to say that the audience was simply held spell-bound, a perfect ovation greeting Dr. Richter at the end of the familiar work.

Another welcome visitor had a cordial reception at the rooms of the Philosophical Society on the 15th ult. Professor Niecks has always something vastly interesting to say for himself, and on such a subject as "Tone-painting" he can hold his own with the leading lecturers of the day. The paper was, indeed, all too short; nevertheless the author of that remarkably able work, "The Life of Chopin," covered an astonishing amount of ground, and the West of Scotland section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians must be felicitated on the success of their opening lecture.

Space considerations can only permit a bare record of last month's miscellaneous Concerts. The Choral and Orchestral Union was announced to commence its season on the 30th ult., with Mr. Achille Rivarde in Saint-Saëns's Concerto for violin and orchestra (No. 3). Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's stimulating "Britannia" Overture was also in the sketch programme, and the re-appearance of Mr. Henschel and his trusted phalanx of eighty performers was looked forward to with exceeding interest. The first monthly Concert in connection with the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music again showed how well the principal, Mr. Allan Macbeth, can provide an attractive bill of fare. The hall was crowded, as is usual at these pleasant gatherings, and on the same evening (the 6th ult.) Mr. William Nicholl, of the Royal Academy of Music—and a popular native of St. Mungo, be it recorded—gave an interesting address on "Voice Production," under the auspices of the Glasgow Society of Musicians. Reverting to the flourishing music school just-named, whose pupils number at the present moment not less than 1,250, the opera class revived by special request Gounod's "Mirella," on the 24th ult. and three following evenings. There was also a Matinée on the 27th ult., and it may be of interest to state that the chorus and orchestra numbered seventy performers. A singularly choice programme was submitted by Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick on the evening of the 22nd ult., Mr. Greene himself having been set down for no fewer than sixteen songs. Mr. Borwick's pianoforte solos included Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, and examples of Mendelssohn, Brahms, and Liszt. The Ayr Choral Union has placed Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and Handel's "Samson" under rehearsal; the Vale of Leven Choir takes up the "Rose Maiden"; the Springburn Choral Society will give during the season "The Erl-King" and Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day"; Mr. Gaul's "Israel" is under study by the Bridge of Weir Musical Association; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" is in charge of the Airdrie Choral Union; and "Silvia" will be heard under the auspices of the Thornliebank Society and the New Kilpatrick Musical Association. The Dumbarton Choral Union will produce the "May Queen" and "Acis and Galatea."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A period of dulness, to a degree abnormal even for the summer months, has been succeeded by an especially busy commencement of the regular winter season in Liverpool and its district. The Philharmonic Society opened, on the 9th ult., with a programme in which the leading feature was Antonin Dvorák's Symphony, entitled "From the New World." Impressions of lands associated with the more generally acknowledged romantic side of things have been crystallised by other writers, and why should not those of the prairie and the plantation also be recorded? Gottschalk in his pianoforte music had probably made the greatest advance in this direction till of late, but now the leading writer from the Sclav regions has fairly crowned the edifice. The "American" Symphony—for this will doubtless become its recognised title—is something more than a jeu d'esprit, though to the uninitiated it may appear as belonging to such a classification. It is a genuine sample of tone-colour of the most vivid description cast in a legitimate mould. Longfellow loved the subject and brought the crude suggestions of negro life and negro verse within the meshes of the poet's net, and Dvorák has now given us his impressions of the many-sided characteristics, past and present, of the people among whom his lot is now, with apparent happiness, cast. The construction of his Symphony will naturally not remain unquestioned by pedants, but it will probably prove fully able to take care of itself as well as of the fame of its creator. At the second Philharmonic Concert, on the 23rd ult., Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Grieg's "Sigurd Jorsalfar" Suite were given, together with Saint-Saëns's Fantasia "Africa" for pianoforte and orchestra; Miss Fanny Davies being at the clavier. The performance was good, as usual, under Sir Charles Hallé; and both the Symphony and Suite had been heard on the previous Saturday at the initial Concert of the Orchestral Society, under Mr. Rodewald. This was a distinct advantage in the case of the Grieg number, the latter being an absolute novelty in this district.

Dr. Richter visited us on the 13th ult. and with his touring orchestra of ninety performers produced a programme of exceptional interest. The latter has probably — judging by the fact that Mr. Vert's book of words was undated and not localised even on its cover—been heard in most of the other leading provincial cities, and it is work of supererogation to speak of such masterful performances as that of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony, for instance, under the bâton of this prince of conductors.

Several other Concerts have been given during the past month, more or less of the private speculative order; but their programmes, mostly of the ballad type, call for no special comment. An exception to this must be chronicled, however, in regard to the first local Festival of Nonconformist Choirs, at St. George's Hall, on the 16th ult., when Mr. Minshall—who is the recognised chief of the same movement in London—conducted a very fine choir of about five hundred voices. Mr. H. A. Branscombe did duty at the organ, and the general effect was excellent. In the same Hall the first Sunday Concert was given on the 14th ult., when Mr. Argent's orchestra of seventy players bore the chief share of the work, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony being the central figure of the programme. The second Concert of this series was announced for the 28th ult., too late to notice at present. There were announced, for the same date—more's the pity—a Concert of the Postal Band, under Mr. Moynagh, at the Picton Hall, and a performance of Handel's "Samson," by the Musical Society, under Mr. D. O. Parry, at St. George's Hall, on the 30th ult. The vocalists engaged were Miss Fanny de Boufflers, Miss Dora Barnard, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint.

Earlier in the season than has been the case hitherto, Oratorio was given at St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral, on the 18th and 25th ult., under Mr. Collins, Mr. F. H. Burstall being at the organ. The work selected was Sullivan's "Light of the World," the rendering of which proved of an equal order of merit to that repeatedly chronicled herein in regard to these gatherings of local church choristers.

The North-Western section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held its third Sectional Conference on the 13th ult., when there was a large and representative muster of professional people at the Adelphi Hotel. Business was transacted in the morning, and in the evening a pleasant Concert took place, the rest of the day being devoted to a visit to the Hope-Jones electric organ works at Birkenhead and the Richter Concert at the Philharmonic Hall. An excellent new sectional Secretary has been appointed in the person of Mr. Carl Heinecke, vice Dr. Hunt, who has resigned for reasons of health, after doing years of yeoman service for the Society. At what may be considered the final financial meeting of the "Best" testimonial committee, on the 16th ult., it was resolved that the fund be now closed, and the honorary secretaries were instructed to obtain designs and estimates for a brass tablet, to be placed in St. George's Hall, in order to perpetuate the services of the ex-organist to the Corporation. A new Male-Voice Choral Society, on the co-operative system hitherto said to be successful in Belgium, is suggested by Mr. E. Goossens.

The committee of the recent Chester Musical Festival reports that the total number of persons who attended in 1894 was 8,550, exclusive of the congregation at the Sunday evening service, which is estimated at about 4,000. The receipts amounted to £3,324, and, after paying all outgoings, there is a balance of £126 odd. The committee have assigned £70 to the Cathedral organ restoration fund, and the balance to the restoration of the fabric.

The Runcorn Musical Society announces three Concerts, the chief works being Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," and Spohr's "Last Judgment"; and the Warrington Musical Society is rehearsing the second of the compositions named above and the cantata "Adéle," by Mr. F. H. Crossley, who is the Conductor of both these organisations.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The visit of Dr. Richter was very well timed. After the quiet summer months our ears yearned for the satisfactory completeness of orchestral music, and for the first time the eminent chief brought with him the London band with which he has been traversing the provinces, and so secured the mutual understanding and unity of purpose which could not exist except among players long associated and accustomed to yield to the guidance of one controlling hand. The consequence was that—apart from that tolerance of the violent assaults of the brass instruments, to which even Dr. Richter yields—the Concert was an unmitigated pleasure. The tone of the wood-wind was superb, the drummer was judicious, and the strings had ample strength, except when, in the Wagner selections—and especially in "The ride of the Valkyries"—the gentlemen at the back of the platform were allowed to enjoy themselves thoroughly. It was a relief when, in the second part of the programme, the tubas and their kinsfolk retired; although, even then, the doubled horns (which might have been tolerated among the general sonority of the Finale of Beethoven's Symphony) were far too rampant in their announcement of the second subject of the opening Allegro. Our thanks are due, and are cheerfully offered, to Dr. Richter for his general earnestness, his attention to minute details of expression, and especially for his insistence upon a genuine pianissimo so exquisitely delicate as that maintained in portions of the Scherzo of the C minor Symphony; but to a perfect performance it is essential that the force of the different sections of an orchestra should be balanced. It is necessary to write this, because the more demonstrative members of an audience who love power, well-marked rhythm, and plenty of "noise in the tune," are never backward in testifying their gratification; and a really model conductor must hold himself far above the temptation to yield to the desire for unthinking applause. The attendance was far larger than Dr. Richter has ever before attracted here, and should encourage the perseverance which would, evidently, bring a speedy reward.

Sir Charles Hallé commenced his Subscription Concerts on the 25th ult., too late for adequate notice in our present issue. To the strong attraction of Lady Hallé's assistance was added that attending the first appearance of Herr Lundquist, and the announcement of Dvorák's "From the New World" Symphony. The brilliancy with which the Manchester orchestra renders Weber's Concert-Overtures and the "Hungarian" March of Berlioz everybody knows.

The Josef Hofmann Recital was insufficiently announced; and the usual means of securing an audience were not adopted. Consequently, the gathering was by no means so numerous as it was enthusiastic. The young pianist has made great progress during the time he has been judiciously pursuing his studies. In executive skill he now has but little to learn; and in variety and adequacy of expression, time and experience will, doubtless, bring the finishing touches to his artistic qualifications. We should like to hear him again some three years hence.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company has left us, after a fairly successful short season. Dr. Watson's Vocal Society has resumed work, giving, on the 17th ult., Romberg's old-fashioned "Lay of the Bell," and some part-music, especially the very quiet and pleasing four-part "Song for twilight," by Mr. C. H. Fogg. Mr. Barrett's gatherings at the St. James's Hall have recommenced. Mr. Cross has again summoned his many friends to the Association Hall, and Mr. Lane's Philharmonic Choir is actively preparing for public appearance. The Organ Recitals of Mr. Pyne will, during the winter Saturday evenings, draw lovers of serious music to the Town Hall, and altogether there will be no dearth of varied delights.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The musical season may be said to have fairly commenced in this locality, and, judging by present appearances, it promises to be exceptionally attractive. So far, very little calling for remark has been actually achieved; but it may be placed on record that in connection with the Harvest Festival Service at the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on September 27, a very creditable performance of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was given with full orchestra, in place of the anthem. At the same service Dr. Martin's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A and an unpublished Te Deum in E flat, by Dr. G. F. Huntley, were performed, also with orchestra. Dr. Huntley, the recently-appointed Organist of the Cathedral, conducted, Mr. J. H. Beers led the orchestra, and Mr. T. A. Alderson presided at the organ. The solos in "Lauda Sion" were entrusted to Miss Cecilia Armytage, who very ably accomplished her task.

A somewhat similar service was held in St. George's Church, Jesmond, Newcastle, on the 16th ult., the principal work performed on this occasion being Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The orchestra was again led by Mr. J. H. Beers, Mr. J. B. Clark presided at the organ, and Mr. J. M. Preston, the talented Organist of the Church, conducted. Madame Bertha Moore sang the soprano solos in a very conscientious and devotional manner, the other soloists were also eminently satisfactory, and the remarkably fine choruses were rendered in a manner worthy of great praise. The introduction of an orchestra into the church is quite a new departure in this locality; so satisfactory were the results in both cases, however, that it is to be hoped the experiment will be repeated.

It may be mentioned, en passant, that Mr. J. M. Preston has just published, in very neat form, a list of the music performed at his Sunday Evening Organ Recitals in St. George's Church, from January, 1891, to July, 1894. The list contains 299 pieces by no less than 107 different composers; it includes all the most important Fugues of Bach (twenty-three in number), all the Organ Sonatas by Mendelssohn, five of Widor's Organ Symphonies, and works by almost every known composer for the organ; and altogether it constitutes a record of which any organist might justly feel proud.

On the 17th ult. Herr Richter and his London orchestra of ninety performers gave a Concert in Olympia, Newcastle. The programme consisted of the "Meistersinger" Overture, the "Vorspiel" (from "Parsifal") and "The Ride of the Valkyries" (Wagner), Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn (Chorale St. Antonii), Liszt's "Hungarian" Rhapsody, No. 2, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The large hall was filled in every part, and the Concert was most enjoyable throughout.

The Sunderland Philharmonic Society gave its first Concert of the season on the 15th ult., but as it was of a purely miscellaneous character it calls for no remark here further than that the vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Maud Guttérès, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Foli; and the instrumentalists, Mdlle. Janotha (pianoforte), Miss Ethel Barnes (violin), and Mons. Josef Hollman (violoncello). On December 18 this excellent Society will give a performance of "The Messiah," with Madame Bertha Moore, Madame Dews, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Ffrangçon Davies as principals; and on March 6, 1895, the first two parts of Haydn's "Creation" will be given, together with Dr. Hubert Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens."

The South Shields Choral Society has adopted Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" as its chief work for the season. The principal effort of the Gateshead Choral Society will be Sullivan's "Golden Legend," which will be performed under the bâton of Mr. J. M. Preston, in the Town Hall, Newcastle, on February 26. The members of Dr. Rea's Choir are busy rehearsing Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," which will be performed during the season. The Newcastle Harmonic Society, under Dr. Chambers, are said to be preparing for performance Dr. Joseph Parry's "Saul of Tarsus," and the Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society has taken in hand Mr. A. R. Gaul's tuneful cantata "Una."

The Newcastle Chamber Music Society announces four Concerts during the season as usual. For the first of these, on the 31st ult., Brahms's Sextet in B flat (Op. 18) and Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat (Op. 20) were announced, together with other works by members of the Musical Guild. At the second Concert a String Quartet led by Mr. E. Schiever will attend; at the third, a Quartet led by Herr Willy Hess and including Signor Pezze as violoncellist; and for the fourth, Herr Joachim, Signor Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies have been engaged. Such is the success of this admirably conducted Society that the committee are able to give the members a special extra Concert free of charge, a plan adopted during the last few years. For this Concert the Scottish Orchestra has been engaged under Mr. Henschel, and the event will take place on the 14th inst.

Mr. J. H. Beers will also resume his excellent Chamber Concerts this season, at the first of which George Onslow's String Quartet in G minor, Mendelssohn's "Fragments," and Rubinstein's Trio for pianoforte and strings in B flat (No. 3, Op. 52) will be performed.

The Northumberland Orchestral Society is rehearsing Gade's Fourth Symphony, and the Northern Musicians' Benevolent Society is preparing an admirable programme for its Concert on December 10.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual meeting of the North Staffordshire Philharmonic Society was held on September 28, at the Stoke Town Hall. A large number of members attended, and the successful rehearsals of "Samson" gave opportunities for a good display of choral-singing from week to week. The hon. sec., in his report of the last season, paid a high compliment to the worth of his former colleague (the late Dr. West), and mentioned that the membership had grown from 122 to 320, and that the performance of "Fair Rosamond," in April, resulted in a net profit of £11, with an attendance of 1,400 persons.

Two Concerts will be held this season: "Samson," on the 15th inst., and "Elijah," in February. Dr. Hind and Mr. W. Sherratt were appointed as hon. sec. and accompanist respectively, Dr. Hind being successor to the late Dr. West; Mr. J. Broady is librarian. Dr. Swinnerton Heap received quite an ovation as he replied to a vote of thanks for his services. The enthusiastic earnestness evinced augurs well for a successful season.

Much sympathy is being shown with Mr. C. Oliver, hon. sec. of the North Staffordshire Tonic Sol-fa Examination Board, in his severe illness; and now there are strong hopes for a speedy recovery.

Longton Theatre was destroyed by fire last month. To opera lovers this is a distinct loss, as the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company had booked a six nights' engagement for December.

Mr. J. W. Turner's English Opera Company visited Hanley on the 8th ult., the representation of Gounod's "Faust" being the most successful performance of the week. On the 8th ult. the 1894-95 season of the Meakin Popular Concerts commenced. The crowded state of the Victoria Hall testified to the people's appreciation of high-class music. Miss Teresa Blamy, Mr. Dan Billington, Mr. C. W. Perkins (City Organist, Birmingham), and Mr. W. Sherratt (accompanist) were the principals.

The Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society (conducted by Mr. J. Garner) rendered selections from "Israel in Egypt," Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Bishop's "Oh! by rivers," Cowen's "Boat Song," "When winds breathe soft" (Webbe), and a new part-song, "Evening," composed by Mr. Challinor, of Longton. The latter was a great success; our local composer is to be complimented on some rich harmony, and it is worthy of the attention of choral societies as a pleasing and effective part-song. Miss Blamy won the sympathy of her audience with a finished rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and Mr. Dan Billington was equally successful with "Nazareth" and "I'm a roamer." Mr. Perkins at "the king of instruments" secured hearty applause for his carefully selected contributions. We hope the grand organ (from the Saltaire Exhibition) will be used at these Concerts more frequently during this season.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

Music in Yorkshire, though hardly as yet in full swing, may be said to have made an unusually good beginning. At Leeds, the visit of Dr. Richter and his band, on the 18th ult., opened the season brilliantly. The programme, though it would for the most part have been regarded as stereotyped in London, was by no means so in Leeds. Two pieces, the Brahms Variations on a theme by Haydn and Dr. Mackenzie's breezy "Britannia" Overture, were indeed absolutely new to Leeds; but the rest of the programme consisted of familiar Wagner pieces, a Liszt Rhapsody, and the C minor Symphony. As the band was in a happy mood, and the music had been well rehearsed during the tour, the performances were unusually good, and Dr. Richter may be said to have left an excellent impression behind him on his second visit to Leeds. On the 22nd ult. the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company opened a season of three weeks—instead of the customary fortnight—at the Leeds Grand Theatre. "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," Gluck's "Orpheus," and Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" were the most important works included in its first week's programme.

In Bradford, the visit of Sir Augustus Harris's Italian Opera Company was the first event of the season. It opened on September 24 with a more than creditable performance of Verdi's "Falstaff," in which Mr. Bispham's admirable personation of the fat knight was the most distinguishing feature. His performance certainly stood the test of comparison with that of most of the artists who have appeared in the part, whether regarded from a vocal or histrionic standpoint. It was an artistic and consistent piece of character-painting, neither offensively realistic nor, on the other hand, farcically impossible. "Lohengrin," "Orpheus"—in which Miss Giulia Ravogli was as impressive as ever—and "Die Meistersinger" were among the more important operas performed during the week. Considering the difficulty of the last-named work, its performance is said to have been exceptionally good. The Concert season at Bradford began on the 13th ult., when the Bradford Permanent Orchestra gave a Concert at which Mr. Ebenezer Prout conducted his Suite de Ballet and March from "Alfred" with general approval. The Suite was particularly well played. Mr. Cohn's brilliant performance of the solo part in Liszt's Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra on Schubert's "Wanderer," and Miss Dews's expressive singing were also noteworthy features of an interesting Concert. Bradford is apparently seized with a most estimable desire to do honour to native composers, for on the 19th ult. the Bradford Old Choral Society gave its first Concert, the programme of which consisted of Sir Joseph Barnby's "Rebekah" and the "Fridolin" of Mr. Randegger, who, if not a native, is at any rate a naturalized Englishman. Both works were conducted by their respective composers, who were very heartily received. The principals were Madame Medora Henson, Messrs. Ben Davies, W. Thornton, and Andrew Black.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts began on September 25 with a programme of the miscellaneous—if not "variety"—order. The Meister Glee Singers afforded intense delight to the audience by their clever banjo imitations and finished ensemble. Miss Florence Shee also sang, and a more serious side to the programme was given by the excellent pianoforte playing of Miss Pauline St. Angelo, and solos for violin and organ contributed by Mr. Edgar Haddock and Mr. J. E. Ibeson. At the second Concert, on the 9th ult., Dr. Richter's band supplied a programme of orchestral music, of which it is unnecessary to say anything save that the performance was not by any means equal to that given at Leeds a week later, when practice had "made perfect." On the 2nd ult. the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave a Concert, the programme consisting of part-songs and similar concerted vocal music. Mr. J. E. Ibeson conducted.

Dr. Spark's Organ Recital, on the 6th ult., upon the fine instrument in the Town Hall, Leeds, was attended by an overflowing audience. The programme included the performer's Festal March in D, composed in commemoration of the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. At the Recital on the 20th ult. Dr. Spark was ably assisted by Mr. Leonard Sedgwick. Mr. J. E. Newell's cantata, "The Christian Pilgrim," was performed at the Victoria Road Methodist Free Church on Sunday, September 30. The principals were Miss Dixon, Mrs. Atkinson, Mr. Percy Leigh, and Mr. T. J. Bellingham. Mrs. Tom Barton was the organist, and Mr. Barton conducted.

MUSIC IN SOUTH AFRICA (CAPE TOWN).

(From our own Correspondent.)

The winter season is now practically over, and so far the musical attractions have been well arranged, and, judging by the size of the audiences, fairly appreciated. This year's Ballad Concerts do not compare altogether favourably with last year's, but the falling off may be accounted for by the fact that last year both Mr. Santley and Signor Foli gave highly successful Concerts. Possibly the absence of Sir Henry and Lady Loch, who have done much to promote the growth of musical culture in the neighbourhood of Cape Town, has tended somewhat to depress local activity in this direction. Of course, as usual, there have been plenty of Concerts, but they were for the most part confined to the amateur element which, though of only local interest, is distinctly good.

Of the important musical events of the season, first and foremost comes the work of the combined choral societies of Cape Town and suburbs, which has for the last three years exercised a powerful influence upon this part of the Colony. The growth of the organisation has been rapid, and an advance far beyond the expectations of those interested has been made with both chorus and orchestra. Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and "Elijah" were the works dealt with at this year's Festival, which took place during the first week in September, the total strength of chorus and orchestra amounting to about 280 performers. Great credit is due to the orchestra for their admirable rendering of both works, and especially for their excellent playing of the music of "The Golden Legend." The chorus was in every respect worthy of the occasion, and the massive choruses in "Elijah" were given with telling effect. The soloists were Miss Sara Harris, Mrs. Griffith Vincent, Mr. Grant Fallowes, and Mr. Lowinger. Three performances in all were given during the week, and the full attendance amounted to about 2,500. Mr. T. Barrow-Dowling conducted with energy and ability.

Amongst the best of the Ballad Concerts may be mentioned Miss Marguerite Macintyre's series of four Recitals, which took place in the Good Hope Hall during June. Miss Macintyre was ably assisted by Mrs. Griffith Vincent, Miss Anna Bergh, Mrs. Stevenson Bird, Dr. Murray, and Messrs. Grant Fallowes, Lowinger, Hollander, Kyser, and Barrow-Dowling.

Mr. Percy Ould gave two excellent Violin Recitals in the Mutual Hall during July. His programmes consisted of well-known works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Grieg, Wieniawski, Zarzycki, and others, besides two charming pieces from his own pen, a "Reverie d'Amour" and a "Danse Espagnole."

The "Opera in Camera" Concerts of Messrs. Fallowes and Letty, which were held during the early part of the season, drew very good houses on each occasion. Selections from "Faust" and "Maritana" were successfully performed.

In April St. George's Cathedral Oratorio Choir made an excellent impression with Bach's "Passion" Music; while during July the Mendelssohn Society gave a performance of Costa's "Naaman," with orchestra and chorus of nearly 100 performers. A large congregation also assembled in the St. George's Cathedral, on July 18, to hear an admirably conducted Violin and Organ Recital, by Mr. Ould and Mr. Barrow-Dowling; the vocalist on this occasion being Mr. C. H. Cawse. The combined choral societies, under Mr. Barrow-Dowling's direction, performed Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," with about 140 voices, at Claremont, on July 9; and on this occasion also there was an excellent orchestra.

The Musical Society's Concerts, held periodically during the season, were well attended; but nothing worthy of notice in the way of new orchestral music was introduced.

A short season of Grand Opera began at the Opera House on the 4th ult., with Miss Macintyre as prima donna. "La Traviata," "Faust," and "Il Trovatore" were each performed twice. Miss Leonora Braham, Mr. Vernon Reid, and Signor Verdi were also in the cast. All the performances were crowded.

The excellent and greatly appreciated performances given "for the people" at the Victoria Hall, Waterloo Bridge Road, were resumed on the 4th ult., when a miscellaneous musical programme was admirably executed by Miss Edith Tulloch, Madame Hope Glenn, Miss Louise Nanney, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. Frank Swinford. The announcement that the veteran tenor would sing on this occasion caused the spacious theatre to be filled to overflowing, and his appearance on the stage was the signal for an outburst of enthusiastic applause both loud and long, which was renewed after the singer's recital of "My pretty Jane," "Tom Bowling," and "When other lips." Mr. Charles Fry's dramatic recital of "The warriors of the sea" and "The Charge of the Light Brigade"—the latter given as an encore after the former—and his personation of Modus to the winsome Helen of Miss Olive Kennett in the well-known but ever fresh scene from the "Hunchback," were also keenly appreciated and loudly applauded.

Miss Ethel Bauer may claim the honour of having given the first Pianoforte Recital of the season, though it was only of a semi-public nature, the performance taking place at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms, on the 8th ult. Miss Bauer is one of the most talented members of a clever musical family and she continues to make progress, having recently, it is understood, had the benefit of tuition under M. Leschetizky. She certainly played more effectively on this than on any previous occasion, and it is much in her favour as an artist that she was heard to the greatest advantage in pieces by Chopin—namely, the Impromptu in G flat and the Scherzo in B minor, which she played with much expression. Her excellent technique was further manifested in Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp (Op. 78), and minor pieces by Leschetizky, Reinecke, Rubinstein, Liadow, and Liszt.

Mr. Charles Fry's Dramatic Recital, given at the Birkbeck Institution on the 17th ult., claims notice in these columns on account of the introduction of two Recitations, with musical accompaniment, under new conditions. These consisted of Mr. Stanley Hawley's musical settings of Poe's "The Bells" and Kingsley's "Lorraine Lorrée," in which the union between the spoken verse and the music is much closer than in any previous work of the kind. The result of the combination upon reciters it is too early as yet to foresee—they are certainly fettered, but are at the same time helped to a very large extent. The poems named were given by Mr. Charles Fry and his gifted colleague, Miss Olive Kennett, and the effect made on the large audience by both artists was so great that Mr. Hawley, who accompanied, has a right to regard his experiment as, so far, perfectly successful. The rest of the programme, although of considerable interest and performed to the manifest satisfaction of the audience, calls for no comment here.

An attractive Operatic Concert was given at the Crystal Palace on the 6th ult., the programme including selections from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," "Rienzi," "Die Meistersinger," and the greater part of the second Act of "The Flying Dutchman," the last-named being given in costume with scenic accessories. Miss Chrystal Duncan sustained the part of Senta with great dramatic intelligence, and made excellent use of a sympathetic voice, and Mr. William Ludwig gave a dignified and impressive interpretation of the rôle of the Dutchman. Mr. John Probert and Mr. Henry Pope were respectively capable representatives of Erik and Daland. The instrumental portions were excellently rendered by the Crystal Palace Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Manns.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society opened its seventeenth season with a Conversazione, on the 11th ult. Four Concerts will be given, beginning on the 27th inst. with "The Golden Legend." The other works announced for performance are Hofmann's "Fair Melusina," with the Orchestral Suite "Landkenning," by Grieg, on January 29; "The Swan and the Skylark" (Goring Thomas) and the "Hymn of Praise," on March 19; and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," on May 7. Mr. G. H. Betjemann will resume his post as Conductor, but Mr. Thornthwaite, who has so long been honourably associated with the Society, has resigned his office as Honorary Secretary, owing to his removal from the neighbourhood.

During last month the Rev. Canon Shuttleworth has given, on Sunday afternoons, at St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, an interesting series of Lectures, accompanied with musical illustrations, on the great composers. At the first lecture the works and influence of Palestrina and his precursors were dealt with, the illustrations comprising a chant by Notker Balbulus, A.D. 912; an "Ave Mater Domini," by Walter Odington; an "Ave Maria," by Jacob Arkadelt; and Palestrina's setting of "Tenebræ Factæ sunt." The following Sunday the subject was J. S. Bach. On the 4th inst., "The Life and Works of Joseph Haydn" will be commented upon.

The four Concerts announced to be given during this and next month by the Musical Guild have been postponed until February and March next, to be followed by a second series in May and June. Upon the success of these two series will depend the continuance of the Guild's Concerts. The committee state that "a comparatively moderate increase of subscribers would suffice to carry on the work without loss," and it is to be hoped that so laudable an enterprise will not be suffered to fall through from lack of public interest. A change of locale from the Town Hall, Kensington, to a more central position would surely be an advantage.

The Harvest Thanksgiving Services at Hanover Church, Regent Street, were held on the evenings of Wednesday, the 17th ult., and the following Sunday. For the Anthem on the Wednesday evening a selection from a new and well written cantata, "A Song of Praise" (Edmund Rogers), was sung, while the entire work was given on the Sunday evening. The choruses were well sung, as also the solo work by Master Wickens. The services on the Sunday included a Choral Celebration (Stainer in F), the Offertory Anthem being "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer). At the organ was Mr. David J. Thomas, the Organist and Choir Director.

Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow, gave Organ Recitals at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the afternoon of the 13th and evening of the 15th ult. The programmes included Handel's Concerto in A major, Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony in D, Bach's Passacaglia in C minor, the Andante from Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Best's Fantasia and Fugue in E minor, the Overtures to "Medea," "Il pastor Fido" (Handel), and "L'Etoile du Nord," and two Sonatas da Camera by the performer himself. It is to be regretted that such interesting and able performances should not have commanded larger audiences.

Miss Susetta Fenn gave a Concert, at Brixton Hall, on the 23rd ult. She was ably assisted by Mdlle. Vagnolini, Miss Ellen Bliss, Messrs. Sinclair Dunn, Musgrove Tufnail, Frank Swinford, and the St. George's Glee Union. The programme included a costume Recital of Balfe's operetta "The Sleeping Queen," in which the parts were sustained by Miss Emma Fenn (Queen), Miss Susetta Fenn (Donna Agnes), Mr. Sinclair Dunn (Philippe d'Aguilar), and Mr. Swinford (Regent). Mr. W. G. Wood ably accompanied the operetta, and was assisted in the first part of the programme by Mr. Arthur L'Estrange.

Harvest Festival Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Mary's, Kilburn, on the 7th ult., and as is usual at this church, the choir sang Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" after the evening service. The choruses were rendered with remarkable precision, and the tone and phrasing of the choir were excellent throughout; a notable feature was the splendid rendering of "The sorrows of death," by Mr. Edwin Houghton. The anthem, "I will open rivers in high places" (solo, Mr. Ben Grove), was composed by the Director of the Choir, Mr. Edgar Pettman.

An Organ Recital was given by Mr. George Cooper, at Christ Church, Newgate Street, on the 23rd ult. The programme included Sonata in C minor (Berens), Pastorale (Kullak), Prelude and Fugue in D major (A. W. Bach), Russian Fantasia (Freyer), Andante (Mendelssohn), Prelude and Fugue "On the name of Bach" (Bach), Voluntary (George Cooper). The programme was varied with songs by Miss Burchell and violin solos played by Miss Watts. Two anthems, "The radiant morn" (Woodward) and "The Wilderness" (Goss), were also sung by the choir.

A music committee has been organised at the Imperial Institute, consisting of Lord Herschell (chairman), Sir George Grove, Sir John Stainer, Sir Walter Parratt, Mr. Cowen, Dr. Mackenzie, and others. Mr. Randegger will act as honorary Conductor, and a series of five Orchestral Concerts will be given during the winter months by a band chiefly composed of professional and amateur Fellows of the Institute. A choir has also been formed for the performance of glees and other unaccompanied part-music, under Mr. Randegger's direction.

A meeting of the guarantors of the Leeds Triennial Musical Festival was held on the 22nd ult., at the Town Hall, the Mayor, Mr. T. R. Lenty, presiding. The provisional committee reported that Sir A. Sullivan, Dr. Hubert Parry, M. Jules Massenet, and Mr. Edward German had been invited to contribute compositions for the ensuing Festival—the two former being asked for choral works and the two latter for orchestral works. The guarantee fund has exceeded £21,000, which is £1,000 more than the fund for the 1892 Festival.

A Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was held at St. Mark's, Kennington, on the 4th ult., and continued on the following Sunday. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Gadsby's setting in C; after Evensong, on both evenings, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given by the choir, assisted by Messrs. B. Millett and T. Jemmett. Mr. Hamilton Robinson presided at the organ, and Mr. Warren Tear (Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mark's) conducted.

A Harvest Festival was celebrated, on the 4th ult., at St. Paul's, Lisson Grove. The evening Canticles were sung to Tours in F; the anthem was "All Thy works praise Thee," by T. Mee Pattison; and, after the Offertory, Maunder's Thanksgiving Te Deum in B flat was sung. There was a string orchestra, consisting of members of the Post Office Orchestral Society. The Organist was Mr. W. E. Stevenson, and the Conductor, Mr. Thomas Curry.

We omitted to mention, in our notice of the Hereford Festival last month, that the special organ used in the performances was supplied by Messrs. Nicholson, the well-known organ-builders of Worcester. The same excellent firm has, we also notice, recently built a new organ of remarkably fine tone and quality for the Midland Institute, Birmingham, according to specifications supplied by Mr. C. W. Perkins, who gave the inaugural Recital.

Harvest Festival Services were held at St. George's Church, Westcombe Park, Blackheath, on the 14th ult., when large congregations attended. The Anthem was Sir J. Barnby's "Thou visitest the earth and blessest it," and the Canticles were sung to an effective setting in C, composed by Dr. Creser for the London Church Choir Association. Mr. R. W. Browne, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, presided at the organ.

Mr. Charles Wood has just been appointed to a Fellowship at Caius College, Cambridge. Mr. Wood gained an open Scholarship for Composition at the Royal College of Music, and was Organist Scholar at Caius College. He will be remembered as having composed music to Swinburne's Ode, which was performed at the opening of the Royal College of Music new buildings.

The Harvest Festival Services were held at St. Mark's, Notting Hill, on Wednesday, the 10th, and Sunday, the 14th ult. After Evensong on both occasions Spohr's "God, Thou art great" was sung by the choir, with Messrs. Benjamin Millett and Carter as principal soloists. Mr. A. J. Price (Organist and Choirmaster) conducted, and Mr. C. W. Wood accompanied.

A Harvest Festival Service was held at St. Anne's Church, Thorburn Square, on the 14th ult. The Service was Turner in F, and Garrett's Harvest Cantata was given as the anthem. Dykes's Te Deum was also sung. The music was admirably rendered by the choir of the church, under the direction of Mr. Stratton Swann.

Professional musicians will no doubt welcome the issue for 1895 of Messrs. Rudall, Carte and Co.'s useful "Professor's Pocket Book, and Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary," which is now available.

Harvest Festival Services were held at St. Michael's, Star Street, Paddington, on the 17th ult. At the evening service Edmund Rogers's cantata, "A Song of Praise," was excellently sung by the choir.

OBITUARY.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:—

William Taylor, who for twenty-seven years held various positions as organist and choirmaster, first at Guy's Hospital; then at St. Matthew's, New Kent Road; St. Olave's, Southwark; and, lastly, at St. George's. He died on the 17th ult., at his residence, 205, Borough.

Peter Schott, the last surviving male member of the famous German firm of Schott, who were the first publishers of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mass in D; Wagner's "Meistersinger," "Nibelung's Ring," and "Parsifal." The deceased directed, for a number of years, the Paris branch of the firm. Born at Brussels, he became a pupil of MM. Brassin and Rummel, and afterwards, at Mayence, of Herr Adolf Beyschlag. He was a good musician, an excellent pianist, and an exceptionally clever score reader. As a youth he appeared in public at several concerts in Germany. He also published a number of compositions under various pseudonyms. He died on September 27, aged thirty-seven, at Paris.

Georges Lamothe, the French composer of dance music, on the 16th ult., at his country residence at Courbevoie, aged fifty-two. Although chiefly known as a writer of light music, he was also an excellent organist and a successful teacher.

Madame Fürsch-Madi, whose maiden name was Emilie Fourche, the French operatic soprano, at Warrenville, New Jersey, U.S.A. She was engaged for the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie in 1876, and a few years later made her appearance at Covent Garden, where her fine voice and good method gained her deserved applause. Two of her best rôles were Aïda and Elsa. She had recently founded a school of singing.

Joseph M. Homeyer, for many years organist at the Propsteikirche at Duderstadt, and who in years gone by made a reputation as a remarkable organ virtuoso and extempore player. He died on the 5th ult., aged eighty.

Max Klein, a well-known violinist, at Cairo, on the 14th ult., aged thirty-six. He was born at Norwich, became a pupil of Herr Louis Ries and Mr. Carrodus, and was for some years a member of the Philharmonic, Royal Italian Opera, and Richter orchestras. A few years ago he went to the United States, where he joined the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel, and afterwards under Herr Nikisch. Subsequently he went to Melbourne as leader of the Centennial Exhibition Concerts, conducted by Mr. F. H. Cowen. He returned in 1892, but ill-health compelled him to spend the last two winters in Egypt, where he succumbed to tuberculosis.

Edouard Hübsch, a distinguished Roumanian musician, on September 21, at Sinaia, at the age of sixty-three. He was born in Hungary, and studied at the Conservatoires of Prague and Leipzig. In early life he was a popular violin virtuoso; afterwards he settled at Bucharest, where he became Conductor at the National Theatre, and organized the military bands of the country. He published several volumes of Roumanian folk-songs, and also composed the Roumanian National Anthem. He served at Plevna, and at the time of his death he was Inspector-General of Military Music in the Roumanian Army.

Thomas Willert Beale, on the 3rd ult., aged sixty-six, at Gipsy Hill. He was born in 1828, the son of Frederick Beale, of the firm of Cramer, Beale and Addison, and became a pupil of Edouard Roeckel, George French Flowers, and Pugni. He was a good pianist, and composed a good deal of music, which, however, is less likely to be remembered than his contributions to musical literature. Amongst these his recently published "Light of other days," two volumes of interesting reminiscences of the famous singers, performers, and composers with whom he came into contact, is of considerable value as a contribution to the history of music in England during the last fifty years. He took a leading part in the founding of the new Philharmonic Society, and invited Berlioz to conduct its Concerts. Under his nom de plume of Walter Maynard, he contributed a great number of articles to many journals and magazines.

Johanna Jachmann-Wagner, a niece of Richard Wagner and the daughter of Albert W. Wagner, an operatic tenor. She went on the stage when a child, and in 1844 was engaged for the Dresden Opera, where she created the part of Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser" on the production of that opera in 1845. She was also the original Fides in the German version of "Le Prophète," and from 1850 till 1861, between which dates she appeared twice in England, was one of the chief artists at the Berlin Opera. Then she suddenly lost her voice, whereupon she made a début as an actress. After a successful career as such she retired from the stage, but in 1872, after her singing voice had returned to a certain extent, she sang the contralto solo part in the historic performance, conducted by Wagner, of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, on the laying of the foundation stone of the Festival Theatre at Bayreuth. She was also one of the Walküren and Norns in the performances of the "Nibelung's Ring" in 1876. She died at Würzburg on the 13th ult., aged sixty-six.

The death is announced of Joseph Hawkins, who was one of the most prominent men in musical circles in Liverpool about twenty years ago. At that period he was secretary of the then famous representative choir, which took honours at the last of the National Music Meetings organised by Mr. Willert Beale. Deceased was fifty-two years of age.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GREEK MUSICAL NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Somebody raised the question whether Aristoxenus used equal temperament. In reply, I cited the passage in Aristoxenus, pp. 45, 46, which shows that he did not. Mr. Bergholt now comes forward with a couple of quotations from Bellermann and Westphal to the effect that Aristoxenus did use equal temperament. But why should we waste our time upon these second-hand authorities? We know from Aristoxenus himself that they are wrong.

Mr. Bergholt then sets out what he is pleased to call "an exact view of the Aristoxenean intervals (tense diatonic) as Mr. Torr assumes them." His intervals are wrong. He has merely subtracted a major tone from an octave, and then resumed the plan of equal temperament in apportioning the residue. If he means them for the intervals implied in Aristoxenus, pp. 45, 46, the four tones of 1·992 should all be 2·04, like the other one, and the semitones of ·996 should both be ·90. But if he means them for the intervals that Ptolemy assigns to the "tense diatonic" of Aristoxenus, the ·996 should be ·88, and the 1·992 should be alternately 1·93 and 2·17.

He argues that these intervals of his differ so little from the intervals of equal temperament that practically it would not matter which were used. But, even if his intervals were right, his argument would not meet the point I raised. What I urged was this:—"There is no saying to which sect of musicians or what period the hymn must be assigned.". It is not a question of the scheme of Aristoxenus alone, but of other schemes as well, such as those of Archytas, Eratosthenes, Didymus, &c.

To proceed to the next point. Alypius uses two different forms of pycnon in his chromatic scales, one of them having three notes in succession, 1, 2, 3, while the other skips a note, 1, 2, 4. And he does not use these forms promiscuously, but takes them in fixed order. Thus, in the lower Dorian chromatic scale he has 1, 2, 3 in all the five pycna, in the Dorian he introduces 1, 2, 4 in the third pycnon, and in the upper Dorian he introduces it in the second and fifth also; while in the lower Ionian he has 1, 2, 4 in all the five pycna, in the Ionian he introduces 1, 2, 3 in the third pycnon, and in the upper Ionian he introduces it in the second and fifth also.

Mr. Bergholt treats all this as "an anomaly," and maintains that 1, 2, 3 may be taken to mean 1, 2, 4, or conversely. My contention is that 1, 2, 3 means 1, 2, 3, and 1, 2, 4 means 1, 2, 4.

This contention of mine, as Mr. Bergholt remarks, leads to the conclusion that certain kinds of tuning were confined to certain key-pitches. And that, he says, "is clean contrary to the testimony of the Greek writers." In proof of this assertion he cites a passage in Ptolemy, ii., 11, which goes to prove the opposite.

Ptolemy is describing his plan for seven keys. There are to be seven notes within the octave; and the pitch of these notes is fixed, the seven intervals being determined by the ratios 9:8, 21:20, 10:9, 8:7, 21:20, 10:9, 8:7. Seven keys are assigned to these seven notes; and each of these seven keys differs from the rest, not only in its pitch, but in the structure of its scale. Thus, in the Hypo-Dorian key, the interval between proslambanomenos and hypate hypaton is determined by the ratio 8:7, the three intervals in the tetrachord from hypate hypaton to hypate meson are determined by the ratios 21:20, 10:9, 8:7, and the three intervals in the tetrachord from hypate meson to mese by the ratios 9:8, 21:20, 10:9; while in the Hypo-Phrygian key the interval between proslambanomenos and hypate hypaton is determined by the ratio 10:9, the three intervals in the tetrachord from hypate hypaton to hypate meson are determined by the ratios 8:7, 21:20, 10:9, and the three intervals in the tetrachord from hypate meson to mese by the ratios 8:7, 9:8, 21:20.

Mr. Bergholt says that, according to this passage in Ptolemy, the intervals in the Hypo-Iastian key "are exactly the same as those in the Hypo-Dorian or Hypo-Phrygian, only at an intermediate pitch"; thus taking the passage to mean that the corresponding intervals were the same in point of magnitude, so that the scales would differ only in their pitch. But the ratios already quoted are enough to show that this was not the case.

I may add that these ratios of Ptolemy's are fatal to the "postulates" in Mr. Bergholt's previous letter—September, p. 627—for they show that the tone in question was not necessarily a major tone, nor the fourth a perfect fourth.

His next argument is based on a comparison of Alypius with Ptolemy. He says "Ptolemy furnishes the ratios; Alypius furnishes the notation: put the two side by side, and the whole reckless assumption of Mr. Torr falls to the ground." Accordingly, he takes a scale with ratios and notation, as aforesaid; and remarks that "the distance between M and K is here $\frac{8}{7}$, something more than a full tone of $\frac{9}{8}$; and it is clear that K has more than moved into the place already occupied by I: it has even moved past it." Quite so. The fact is that the note has moved past I into the place already occupied by H; and the explanation is that the note is H, not K.

He has taken seven of his eight letters from a diatonic scale in Alypius, and the other one from the corresponding chromatic scale; and having thus replaced the diatonic H by the chromatic K, he points to the surprising fact that K is standing in the place which properly belongs to H. No doubt, he thinks that he is justified in introducing the chromatic K because Ptolemy describes the scale as a combination of the Tense Chromatic with the Medium Soft Diatonic. But a scale could be modified like this without ceasing to be diatonic. Take the Medium Soft Diatonic itself as an example. Aristoxenus tells us how this scale was formed by combining the Soft Chromatic with the Tense Diatonic—see pp. 27, 52—yet Ptolemy and Archytas call it diatonic.

This fault runs through all that Mr. Bergholt says about the other scales in Ptolemy. He always takes the chromatic form of the pycnon, M Λ K or 1 2 3, whereas he ought to take the diatonic form, M Λ H or 1 2 6.

His next argument is based on a passage in Boëthius, which states that the enharmonic tuning would make Δ a note of the same pitch as Γ in the diatonic tuning. But this is not to the point. It is obvious that two notes could be brought to the same pitch by the use of two different tunings. The question is, whether two notes could be brought to the same pitch without a change of tuning. That is the difficulty in the transcript of the hymn. The two notes I and K are placed at the same pitch, while the tuning is unaltered.

Moreover, the figures in this passage of Boëthius will hardly bear examination. He gives 3888 for Δ, 3992 for E, and 4096 for Z, as though he expected to divide the semitone into a pair of quarter-tones by dividing the string midway between 3888 and 4096. But clearly he ought to follow the Pythagorean ratios here in fixing Δ and E, since he follows them in fixing Γ and Z. These ratios of 40 to 39 and 39 to 38 give 3993 and 3891 for E and Δ in the enharmonic scale, while the ratio of 256 to 243 gives 3888 for Γ in the diatonic scale, thus avoiding any interference of the notes.

Mr. Bergholt then proceeds to obtain various results "from Mr. Torr's own admissions." He asserts that "O Ξ N is a pycnum in the Hypo-Lydian chromatic, and may therefore, says Mr. Torr, represent two successive intervals of ¼ tone." And he also asserts that "Mr. Torr permits us to stretch O-N to ¾-tone and to compress M-Λ to ¼-tone." Now, there are three cases in Aristoxenus where the pycnon has intervals of a quarter, three-eighths, and a third of a tone respectively; and I said that these three cases could all be expressed by a pycnon of the form K Λ M or 1 2 3. But here Mr. Bergholt takes the converse of this, as though I had said that every pycnon of this form must be intended to express those cases. I have never said that.

Suppose I were to say that the intervals of tone and tone, tone and semitone, semitone and tone can all be expressed by three consecutive white notes upon the pianoforte, this being the case with C D E, D E F, E F G. Mr. Bergholt might just as reasonably treat that as an "admission" of mine that any three consecutive white notes, such as D E F, may be taken to express the intervals of tone and tone, tone and semitone, semitone and tone.

We may now pass to the next point. In dealing with the schemes of Aristides and Gaudentius, I wrote as follows:—"When the notes in the octave were reduced from twenty-one to twelve, musicians were left with more signs than notes, and it did not matter which of the available signs they selected for use. Thus, when one of the notes was omitted between I and M, it did not matter whether the remaining note was described as K or Λ. In all such cases Aristides took the first note of the two, whereas Gaudentius seems to have taken the second."

Mr. Bergholt denies that the notes were reduced from twenty-one to twelve, and further denies that Aristides and Gaudentius selected their notes in the manner I described.

Gaudentius gives his notes on pp. 23, 24. He says that the first note is ϕ; the second is γ [υ] with τ as duplicate; the third is σ; the fourth is ρ with π as duplicate; the fifth is o; the sixth is ξ with ν as duplicate, and so forth. And he says that each note stands a semitone above the note before.

Aristides gives a list of notes on p. 27, with the remark that they stand a semitone apart. And this list contains ϕ, τ, σ, π, o, ν, while υ, ρ, ξ are relegated to the line below.

These passages show that Aristides and Gaudentius had twelve notes to the octave, the intervals being semitones throughout; and further show that, in dealing with the duplicates, Aristides took the letter that came first in alphabetical order, while Gaudentius took the letter that came second.

In speaking of the passage in Aristides, Mr. Bergholt says that "in the second and third lists every note is set forth (allowing for the lacunæ of copyists), the order of the second list being strictly alphabetical: the fourth list also gives the alphabetical order, tabulating all the modifications of each letter-form." Aristides says on p. 28 that the letters in this fourth list are the letters of Pythagoras—not his own—and the second list is only a repetition of these letters in the order of their pitch as notes. But the third list omits the 5th letter in order of pitch and its octaves the 26th and 47th, and also the 14th and its octaves the 35th and 56th. In other words, it omits the equivalents of C flat and F flat. And these are exactly the omissions that are required to complete the reduction of the notes from twenty-one to twelve. Seven of the notes are set aside as duplicates; and then two others are omitted altogether. It is absurd to speak of these most significant omissions as "the lacunæ of copyists."

Aristides, p. 26, and Gaudentius, p. 23, agree in stating that the duplicates were furnished by the notes which would stand at the end of the dieseis in an enharmonic scale; and their lists bear out this statement, since they treat υ and τ, ρ and π, ξ and ν, as pairs of duplicates, but give no duplicates to ϕ or σ or o. Nevertheless, Mr. Bergholt says that these authorities "will justify the transcript in giving D natural for K as well as I." One would like to know the process of his reasoning. In the schemes of Aristides and Gaudentius the letters for C sharp (A) and D flat (K) become a pair of duplicates, while the letter for D natural (I) is one of those without a duplicate. And this, he says, supports the notion that the letters for D flat (K) and D natural (I) may be treated as a pair of duplicates.

Incidentally he states that "the date of Alypius is A.D. 360 or later." This date can only be obtained by identifying our Alypius with another Alypius who lived about that time. There is not a scrap of evidence in favour of the identification, and a great deal against it.—Yours, &c.,

Cecil Torr.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I will be as concise as possible in my reply to the above letter of Mr. Torr (to which you have courteously given me the opportunity of replying in the same issue), knowing that this controversy has already assumed unreasonable proportions.

Bellermann and Westphal, in the works I cited, show excellent reasons (which, for want of space, I could not reproduce) why the passage Mr. Torr quotes from Aristoxenus is misleading. I repeat that, until Mr. Torr refutes the reasons there given, The Musical Times is fully justified in following Bellermann and Westphal.

I meant my Aristoxenean intervals to be Mr. Torr's, as I understood him to explain them on page 627 (September). His view, as now elucidated, simply reproduces the Pythagorean (di-tonic) tuning, and so makes the rival sects identical—a palpable absurdity.

The whole reply, on Ptolemy II., 11, is vitiated by Mr. Torr's failure to discriminate between the names by "position" and those by "power." I referred exclusively to the latter; Mr. Torr assumes the former. In every one of Ptolemy's scales in the chapter quoted, the ratios between notes of the same "power" are invariable.

As to Ptolemy II., 15, Table 7, my translation into notes is quite correct. Ptolemy mixes the Chromatic and Diatonic by taking one whole tetrachord from each. By doing the same with the notes of Alypius, I get the exact notational equivalent. Mr. Torr confuses Ptolemy's method of mixture with another quite different method, whereby the two genera are combined in the same tetrachord.

How Boëthius, in Mr. Torr's opinion, ought to have divided his string is irrelevant. He actually does divide it so as to make manifest that he regards it as a usual thing for the ancients to bring Δ and Γ to the same level of pitch. That is my point; by conceding this (as Mr. Torr is forced to do) he entirely contradicts his previous assertions.

To establish the accuracy of my reading of Aristides as against Mr. Torr's, I need only refer to the fac-simile Codices published by Bellermann and Albert Jahn, and to their critical remarks thereon. I state nothing that has not been established by these editors beyond all reasonable doubt. Considerable fresh light has been thrown on this matter since Meibom wrote.

For my date of Alypius I gave proper references.

As a brilliant piece of special pleading, or as a masterly strategical retreat under cover of a cloud of dust, Mr. Torr's letter commands my respectful admiration. But I cannot regard it as of any value as a serious rejoinder to my arguments.—Yours, &c.,

Ernest Bergholt.

[We cannot spare further space for this discussion, and must now leave the matter to the impartial judgment of those of our readers who have followed it. For our own part, the more we look into Mr. Torr's theory, the more do we become convinced that it can be supported on no historical or scientific basis. Our readers will see by our review of Mr. Monro's "Modes of Ancient Greek Music" that the views we have maintained are, at any rate, in agreement with those of an acknowledged authority.—Ed., M.T.]

THE MUSIC HALL OF THE FUTURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The excellent article in your last issue on the above subject is peculiarly àpropos at a time when the pages of one of your daily contemporaries are filled with correspondence on the conduct of our public places of entertainment. The social side of this question does not, Sir, come within the province of your paper, nor would you, perhaps, wish it to do so, but the question of the entertainment and its conditions is doubtless of interest to your readers. I would suggest that the writer of your article should pay a visit to the Royal Victoria Hall one evening, where he will find that such a music hall, "where men can, and do, take their wives and daughters," already exists, at least, for the masses. I can only speak personally of the "Ballad nights," when I have seen the large theatre crammed with an enthusiastic audience, chiefly of the lower middle, and lower classes, and, "amid an atmosphere of decency and domesticity," give ear to good music. Looking through a number of old programmes, I can recall performances of violin pieces by Schubert, Mendelssohn, Zarzycki, Papini, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Sarasate, and others; of ballads sung by some of our most eminent vocalists; and of glees sung by a quartet party. I have heard a movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto enthusiastically applauded, and have noted the audience listening with profound attention to the recitation of such pieces as "Virginia," "Horatius," and scenes from Shakespeare given by reciters of established reputation. True, the Ballads were of the "tuney" order, but they were at least wholesome, and most of them good, for the audience love the "old, old songs" best. The orchestra, which plays popular overtures, &c., at the beginning of each part, might be augmented and improved with advantage and would then, no doubt, be heard with greater attention than at present. Surely all this indicates that the people will listen to good things when provided. I am aware, of course, that such artists as I have heard would not appear at an ordinary music hall, and that their services could only be obtained on account of the philanthropic nature of the Institution, and their regard for its enthusiastic founder, Miss Emma Cons; but there are doubtless many young artists of smaller repute who would be glad to discourse good music before popular audiences for moderate fees. I have omitted to mention that both smoking and drinking—the latter non-alcoholic, as this is a temperance Institution—are permitted in certain parts of the theatre; but as the German enjoys his pipe and lager beer while listening to Café Concerts there is no reason why the Englishman should not have similar privileges. The obvious inference is that, given a reasonable amount of liberty—not license—"middle class" audiences will accept good and wholesome entertainments when offered them; and surely this is a better way of combating the difficulty—even in its social aspect—than all the puritanical tirades hurled against the present system—even as the great "drink" question is being solved better by the establishment of "coffee palaces" and the like than by the anathemas of intemperate teetotallers. Hoping, Sir, your contributor will adopt my suggestion and judge for himself.—I am, yours obediently,

Middle Class.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

A. L. Fillingham.—The subject is fully dealt with in Carl Engel's "Musical Myths and Facts" (2 Vols., Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.) and in Kastner's "Les Sirènes," the contents of which are briefly described in Novello's Library Catalogue, p. 410.

H. E. Earle, Brooklyn.—The Greek Hymns have been printed in various Histories of Music, but they have recently been published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., of whom they may be obtained for sixpence. No light has been thrown on the alleged passage in Saint-Saëns's work. The composer was probably hoaxed. The Interviews will be resumed when possible—they were not meant to appear regularly. We will reply to your other enquiry in our next.

York.—The Organists of York Minster during the last 150 years have been: J. Naylor, 1883; E. G. Monk, 1859; John Camidge, 1844; Matthew Camidge, 1803; John Camidge, 1756; J. Nares, 1734.

E. Sola.—The poems by Hood, Moore, and Mrs. Hemans are no longer copyright.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Bournemouth.—Two attractive Organ Recitals were given by Dr. W. Lemare, on the 10th ult., in St. Nathanael's Church, Westbourne. Dr. Lemare, whose pieces included a Festival Postlude by Volkmar and an Andante Religioso by Scharwenka, was assisted by Mr. E. C. Winslade, solo violin; Mr. F. C. Ford, violoncellist; the vocalists being Miss E. M. Lemare, Mr. Figgins, and members of the church choir.

Brighton.—The Dome was well filled by an appreciative audience on the 18th ult., when the Sacred Harmonic Society gave a special performance of Gounod's "Redemption," in commemoration of the composer's death. The choir did its work with admirable precision, attention to gradation of tone and intelligent appreciation of the impressive nature of the music. The rendering of the majestic choruses "Forth the royal banners go" and "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," was in particular worthy of praise. Miss Annie Swinfen, who made her first appearance here on this occasion, gave sympathetic expression to the beautiful solo "From Thy love as a Father"; Miss Ada Watchurst also made a successful début, and Mrs. W. J. Mobsby and Miss Hilda Taylor, members of the Society, may be congratulated on their effective assistance. Mr. Boulcott Newth and Mr. Charles Phillips were the Narrators, and Mr. Charles Hinchliffe sang the words of Jesus with impressive effect. The orchestra was admirably led by Mr. W. A. Baker, Mr. P. J. Starnes presided at the organ with artistic judgment, and Mr. Robert Taylor conducted with his customary ability.——An audience of about 2,000 assembled in the Dome, on the 22nd ult., to hear Dr. Richter's Orchestral Concert. Concerning the programme, the Prelude to "Parsifal" and Brahms's Orchestral Variations had never been performed in Brighton before, nor had, we believe, the arrangement of Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 1). Even so hackneyed a piece as the "Walkürenritt" had only been played in Brighton once—viz., when Richter brought his orchestra some years ago. The audience was, throughout, most enthusiastic, and made a very determined attempt to encore the "Walkürenritt," which Dr. Richter steadily resisted and finally defeated. A pamphlet had previously been circulated by Messrs. Chester, which contained an account, written by Mr. H. Davey, of the various works performed; and very general interest had been excited in the Concert, which was set forth as a great and quite exceptional musical opportunity.

Canterbury.—Mr. J. Sterndale Grundy, deputy-organist to the Cathedral, gave an excellent Concert, on the 2nd ult., in the Music Hall. The Concert-giver took part, with Mr. C. M. Gann and Miss Kate Ould, in Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 49), and was assisted by Signor Tito Mattei, Miss Helen Saunders, and Mr. Lyon Farrand, the last-named being a promising young tenor vocalist from the Guildhall School of Music.

Cardiff.—Mrs. Alfred Morris's admirably trained Gwent Ladies' Choir made a most successful first appearance here on the 3rd ult., at the Park Hall. The programme contained the effective sketch entitled "Spanish Gipsy Life," in which the executants appear in costume. The choir subsequently gave similar performances at Magor and Gwent, the following ladies being mentioned in eulogistic terms by the local press: Mrs. Morris, Mrs. Lang, Mrs. J. P. Lewis; and the Misses L. Taplin, K. James, L. Jones, F. Tamplin, G. Rogers, M. James, B. Pottinger, Allen, Hillier, Richards, and M. Watkins.

Chigwell.—The Harvest Festival Services in the Parish Church were well rendered musically. On the evening of the 14th ult. a new Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by the Organist, Mr. Henry Riding, were given with good effect; and on the 17th ult. the special choir of eighty voices sang Spohr's "God, Thou art great." Mr. Reynolds accompanied, and Mr. Riding conducted.

Diss, Norfolk.—A very artistic Afternoon Concert was given, on the 11th ult., in the Corn Hall, by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, assisted by Miss Mary Hay and Mr. A. E. Izard. The two gentlemen were advantageously heard in Mozart's Sonata in B flat (No. 10) for violin and pianoforte, and in solos admirably played on their respective instruments. Miss Hay's singing of an excellent selection of songs was also greatly enjoyed. In the evening, Mr. Gatehouse gave an admirable popular Concert, special features of which were his own fine violin playing, Mr. Izard's rendering of Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccio, and Miss Hay's singing. Able assistance was also rendered by Mr. A. Hemstock at the organ, in vocal quartets by Miss Pullen, Miss K. Pullen, and Messrs. K. Evans, A. Bobby, H. Mase, and F. A. Tipple, members of the Diss Choral Society, and instrumental pieces performed by the band.

Eastbourne.—Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Town Hall, on the 13th ult., when her renderings of Weber's Sonata in C, a selection from Brahms's latest pianoforte pieces, and Chaminade's Scherzo (Op. 35, No. 1) were particularly admired. She was ably assisted by Mr. Charles Williams in Reinecke's duet "La belle Griseldis," and by Miss Louise Phillips, who sang with her usual success.

Frome.—An effective performance of "The Messiah" was given on the 20th ult., in Market Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Millington. About 170 executants took part in the rendering, the accompaniments of which were played by a full orchestra, led by Mr. W. E. Cox, with assistance on keyboard instruments from Mrs. Welham, Mr. Giddings, Mr. Prosser, and Mr. J. D. Cox. The soloists were Miss M. Davies, Miss B. Grant, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. D. Harrison.

Gravesend.—One of the most interesting Concerts, under the auspices of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, was given at the New Public Hall, on the 10th ult., when Sir Charles and Lady Hallé made their first appearance here and were accorded a most enthusiastic reception. The performances of these artists were followed with the closest attention, and Lady Hallé, in response to an irresistible demand for more, after her rendering of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, gave an Irish Reel by Stanford. The vocal portion of the Concert was entrusted to the Westminster Singers, whose artistic and refined singing aroused much enthusiasm; two of their selections—viz., "In Absence," by Dudley Buck, and Dr. Bridge's humorous glee, "The Goslings," being repeated. Mr. Harper Kearton sang "A May Song," by Leoni, and Mr. W. H. Brereton "Oh! oh! hear the wild wind blow," by Tito Mattei. The Concert altogether was a great success. This Association will celebrate its Jubilee Concert, on December 5, by a performance of Handel's "Messiah."

Halifax, Nova Scotia.—Mr. F. Gatward, the Cathedral Organist, gave an Organ Recital at St. George's, on September 18, when his programme included Bach's great G minor Fugue. His lecture on "Acoustics" last month, at the Church of England Institute, also attracted many listeners.

Haslingden.—At the choral contest held here on the 6th ult., Dr. Hiles, who was the adjudicator, awarded the first prize to the Reedyford Wesleyan Choir, conducted by Mr. R. R. Widdop. The second and third prizes were respectively gained by the Leeds Vocal Union, conducted by Mr. A. H. Ashworth, and the Ramsbottom Presbyterian Choir, under the direction of Mr. R. Sharples.

Henley-on-Thames.—The Harvest Festival Services at Holy Trinity Church were held on the 4th and 7th ult., when Garrett's Harvest Cantata was sung by the choir (which is now augmented by a number of ladies), under the direction of Mr. J. H. Chalmers, the Organist and Choirmaster.

Hull.—Mr. Arthur Hudson gave a Chamber Concert, on the 23rd ult., in St. George's Hall. The programme contained Emil Sjögren's Sonata in E minor (Op. 24) for violin and pianoforte, heard in Hull for the first time on this occasion, and Arthur Hervey's Romance in D for the same instruments. Mr. Arthur Hudson played the violin, Mr. J. W. Hudson the violoncello, Mr. W. Janssen the pianoforte, and an excellent selection of songs were contributed by Miss J. Langford and Mr. M. Roberts.

Lee.—The Harvest Festival at St. Mildred's Church was celebrated on the 11th ult., in the presence of a crowded congregation. The "Creation" was sung, in the place of the anthem, by a choir of 100 voices, assisted by a full orchestra of twenty-five instrumentalists. The soloists were Master Sterndale Bennett and Messrs. Heathcote and Dilley. Mr. F. L. Kett, Choirmaster of the Church, conducted with his usual ability and skill, and Mr. G. H. Court ably presided at the organ.

Melbourne, Australia.—The fourth annual report of the Choral Union is a most satisfactory document. The singing of the choir, under the skilful direction of its Hon. Conductor, Mr. Ernest Jäger, has attained a high standard of excellence, as witnessed by the success of the Society in several choral contests during the past year, and its charitable efforts during the past eighteen months have been instrumental in raising a sum of over £90 for the relief of distress in the neighbourhood. The Conductor's notes indicate artistic enterprise and high aims, and many details show that the Society is well worthy of the support, not only of every music-lover, but also of every well-wisher for the community at large.

Middlesbrough.—Mr. Felix Corbett began his new series of excellent Concerts, in the Town Hall, on the 3rd ult., when he appeared as solo pianist and as the composer of two effective songs, respectively entitled "Other days" and "Come, come away," the words of the former being by Lewis Morris and those of the latter by Herrick. The programme, which was of an artistic character, was admirably interpreted by Madame Alice Gomez, Miss Mabel Berry, Madame Hast, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Leo Stern, and the Meister Glee Singers.

Romford.—An effective rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given in the Parish Church, on the 18th ult., by an augmented choir with orchestral accompaniment. The tenor solos were well sung by Mr. Sadleur Brown, the rest of the solo work being sustained by choirboys of the church. Mr. F. W. Strohmeyer was leader of the orchestra, Mr. Gilbert W. Tozer presided at the organ, and Mr. Charles Wood, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, conducted.

Runcorn.—The Tonic Sol-fa Prize Choir gave its first Concert of the season on the 17th ult., in the Public Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Holford. The soloists engaged were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Mr. Pownall, and Mr. Stanley Cookson, vocalists; and Mr. V. L. Needham, flautist, all of whom were very successful. There was a good attendance.

Southampton.—Miss Marie Wurm's farewell Concert, which took place at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 5th ult., was altogether a success. The Concert-giver was assisted by Mrs. Ernestine Walker, Miss Louise Nanney, and M. Ernest du Domaine. Much regret is felt by the musical public of Southampton at the removal of so thorough an artist as Miss Wurm from their midst.

Southend.—The interesting and instructive series of Concert-Lectures given by Mr. Baylis in his music room were concluded, on the 6th ult., by a Concert in the Union Hall, at which the pianoforte playing of Mr. Baylis and Mr. Sladdin was much appreciated, and Miss Bertha Sladdin and Mr. Sandor Merei were the vocalists.

Wellington, New Zealand.—An interesting musical performance, entitled "An Evening with Handel and Haydn," was given on August 30, in St. Peter's Church, under the able direction of Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell. The selections comprised excerpts from "The Messiah" and "Creation," the soloists being Mrs. Mackintosh, Miss Stanford, and Messrs. E. F. Pollock, Prouse, Richards, A. Clothier, and Pickering. Mr. Trimnell accompanied on the organ and also played Handel's Second Concerto in B flat.

Wolverhampton.—Madame Fanny Moody's Ballad and Opera Recital Company made a successful appearance at the Agricultural Hall, on the 22nd ult., when Gounod's opera "Philemon and Baucis" formed the second part of the programme, under the conductorship of Signor Mascheroni.

Wolverton.—A very successful Concert, organised by Mr. Richard Devey, was held at the Science and Art Institute on the 15th ult., when the hall was filled by a large audience. Selections were sung from "The Messiah" by the Choral Society, which numbers 300 members, under the able conductorship of Mrs. Medland Newsham. The solo artists were Miss Lizzie Scott, Miss Rowllings, Rev. M. Miller, and the Rev. H. C. Jollye. Miss Edith Stapley (violinist) and the Institute's Orchestral Band, the latter conducted by Mr. Whitlock, contributed several pieces and added to the success of the evening.

Felix Presnail, to St. Mary's, Southchurch.—Mr. J. R. Andrews, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. A. C. THE

(Stabat Mater Speciosa)

A CANTICLE FOR CHRISTMAS

Words translated from Giacopone (13th Century) by

REV. DR. NEALE.

MUSIC BY

J. FREDERICK BRIDGE,

D.Mus.,

Organist of Westminster Abbey; Gresham Professor of Music.

This Work occupies about Half-an-Hour in Performance, and comprises Solos for Soprano and Baritone and Four Choruses, one of which is a Carol. The Work may be publicly performed and the words printed without further permission.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Giacopone's beautiful companion sequence to his more famous hymn on the Passion has suggested the composition of a short cantata which will be a most welcome addition to Christmas music. . . . In his new work Dr. Bridge has confirmed the impression made by his beautiful setting of the hymn 'Rock of Ages'—that he is at his best in music of a devotional class; he has maintained the interest of his work from the first chorus to the last."—Times.

"The beauty and propriety of this music seem complete. In respect of melody and harmony alike all is grace and tenderness, simple and affecting as the subject demands, but made more so by the touches of highly cultivated art. . . . Cannot fail to enhance the composer's reputation. It contains genuine vocal music as well as tasteful and effective orchestration, while scarcely a page lacks winning grace."—Daily Telegraph.

"Cheerful in style, but genuinely effective, is not beyond the means of ordinary choirs."—Daily News.

"Remarkable for lyrical beauty and melodiousness . . . and may be regarded as a valuable addition to our Christmas Festival Church music."—Morning Post.

"More gratification will be derived from 'The Cradle of Christ' than from many longer works, for it is sure to find friends in every quarter."—Daily Chronicle.

"Throughout the whole work . . . Dr. Bridge displays not only sound scholarship but sincere sentiment . . . and the concluding choruses exhibit the composer's power of working up to an effective climax in a decidedly happy light."—Daily Graphic.

"A charming little work, and forms a welcome addition to the plentiful but not overstocked store of Christmas sacred music. A more appropriate setting of the 'Stabat Mater Speciosa,' or one more calculated to satisfy both devotional and artistic requirements, could hardly be conceived."—Sunday Times.

"Distinctively clever and well written, with many of those little touches that only a man well versed in art knows how to give, and is withal an interesting little composition."—Musical Standard.

"Well adapted for Church use, and will probably be heard in not a few churches when the Feast of the Nativity comes to be celebrated. . . . The music, whether vocal or instrumental, is thoroughly well adapted for voice or instrument, as the case may be, and there are no complexities or other difficulties that need deter a fairly competent choral society or church choir from attempting the work."—Yorkshire Post.

"Notable for its directness and melodious freshness."—Leeds Mercury.

"A musicianly production displaying knowledge kept in due bounds by devotional feeling, and worthy of the notice of enterprising choral societies."—Birmingham Gazette.

"A very fine work, and will no doubt prove useful for choral societies. Dr. Bridge has evidently hit the popular taste in this canticle."—Bristol Times.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Carol separately, price Threepence.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

*UNA

4TH AND 5TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Seventh and Eighth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

5TH AND 6TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

†ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; vocal parts, each, 1s. Words only, *7s. 6d.; †5s. per 100.

BY

G. HENSCHEL

(Op. 53).

Vocal Score, 8vo, Paper Cover, 2s. 6d.
Full Score and Orchestral Parts (printed), on hire.
Vocal Parts, 1s. each.

THE TIMES.

A musicianly piece of work and altogether worthy of Mr. Henschel's high reputation.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The new "Stabat Mater" is quite worthy of a place among accepted settings of the same text, and a valuable addition to the rich store of music possessed by the Roman Catholic Church. . . . There was not a dull moment nor a break in close attention, the music becoming more full of interest as it proceeded, and the climax being the close. . . . The melodies are throughout full of beauty, or else marked by studiously appropriate expression. Whether passionate or tender, whether inspired by pity or exultation, they all have the true eloquence which consists in propriety.

STANDARD.

Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater" is beyond all question an extremely thoughtful and musical work, and the composer, who conducted, must have been well satisfied with its performance, and with the hearty reception accorded to it by the audience.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Henschel may be congratulated upon the manner in which he has realised the meaning of the words, and succeeded in producing a work which, in spite of obvious comparisons, may be accepted as an admirable musical interpretation of the beautiful hymn. . . . It appertains to the class of music that touches the heart, which, indeed, is the only music worthy of being so termed.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Henschel has regarded the old Latin hymn from the most reverential aspect, so that it is a composition even better suited to a church congregation than to an ordinary concert audience, which cannot be affirmed of all versions, of Rossini, for example; but there is at least one section in which the pervading sombreness of tone is for a time suspended. This is the "Eia Mater," the fourth number, set as an alto solo and chorus. By lovers of flowing tune—and there are more such than some composers suppose—this number will be considered the gem of the work.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

It is a work of considerable originality, essentially romantic in its sentiment, and thoroughly in keeping with the ritual of the Church in the hymnology of which Giacopone's famous poem occupies so conspicuous a place.

THE GUARDIAN.

His new "Stabat Mater" (Op. 53) for solo, quartet, chorus, and orchestra, is unquestionably a work of great cleverness and interest, and no little beauty.

KING SAUL

AN ORATORIO

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Vocal Score, 8vo, Paper Cover, price 5s.; Paper boards, 6s.; Cloth, gilt, 7s. 6d.
Full Score and Orchestral Parts on hire; Vocal Parts, 1s. 6d. each.

THE TIMES.

. . . Not a page in the work but is worthy of the only composer who could possibly have written it; and whether we have regard to the grandeur and dramatic force of the conception, the masterly treatment of vocal and instrumental portions, or the actual melodic invention, we must assign "King Saul" a place beside the two works just referred to. . . . We have nothing but admiration to bestow on the new Oratorio. . . . The success of the new work is indubitable.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

More than ever does it now seem to me proved that Dr. Parry has learned the secret and grasped not a little of the power with which the great masters of oratorio wrought their wonders. . . . The work grows in strength and all fine musical qualities as it proceeds, which statement means that the more intense the drama the higher the composer has risen. . . . We are sometimes reminded of Handel, notably by frequent orchestral interludes full of lively figuration, sometimes of Mendelssohn, above all at points requiring powerful and succinct choral effects. Of this I should be the last to complain. It is good to have a contemporary willing to link on to his great predecessors and continue the chain unbroken. But Dr. Parry is at his best where the tragedy deepens and the dramatic action intensifies. . . . Thus does the composer rise to the height of his argument and show himself greatest when most is demanded. . . . In "King Saul" we have a noble addition to English oratorio, concerning which we shall not be afraid to speak with our enemies in the gate.

STANDARD.

Certainly in structural outline, both as regards the libretto and the music, the work is his most ambitious and imposing effort, and he is most successful in those episodes specially calling for loftiness of treatment. In this direction Dr. Parry shows his strength, and earns his title to be considered one of the greatest of living oratorio composers of this or any other musical nation. . . . The reception of the work was never for an instant in doubt; indeed, the rule forbidding applause at the morning performances was speedily broken through, and at the conclusion rounds of cheers testified to the delight of the audience.

DAILY NEWS.

The work is so dramatic, so thoroughly imbued with manliness and dignity, the choral writing is so splendidly effective, and the orchestration so well in keeping with the spirit of the whole, that it will, beyond doubt, at once pass into the repertory of those choral societies which possess the means to undertake it.

MORNING POST.

Strength, vigour, masterly workmanship, characteristics intimately associated with Dr. Parry's style, are imprinted upon every page of this fine score, which bears the stamp of sincerity and lofty purpose. Besides these, a greater feeling for melody of what might be termed a luscious kind and a less formal mode of expression are apparent. The strong dramatic power noticeable throughout also deserves mention. . . . In his solos he is profoundly emotional and dramatic, and the listener is carried away by the irresistible power of the music. . . . There are portions of his work in which Dr. Parry has reached the highest standard of excellence, and the superabundance of choral matter may indeed not prove detrimental to the Oratorio in the opinion of many.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It is seldom that anything is gained by keeping back good news, so let it at once be stated that Dr. Parry's latest work must be classed among his finest efforts, and is therefore a most valuable addition to native art. . . . The choral numbers and the instrumentation show Dr. Parry at his very best. There are pages in the score that the greatest of the masters held in the highest honour by successive generations of thoughtful musicians might have written, whilst throughout the work allotted to the chorus and orchestra there is a vigour, breadth, and fulness—combined with richness of colouring—that appeared lost to the sacred branch of British musical art prior to the advent of Dr. Parry. . . . The healthy musicianship and inherent strength of the Oratorio make it a work of which the nation has cause to be proud.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

As for the music to which Dr. Parry has set this great and moving drama, we may say at once that it has not falsified the high expectations excited by the noble series of choral works which we already owe to his pen. . . . The martial numbers in the first act, and the chorus of triumph over David's exploit in the second, are instinct with the very breath of victory. Not less striking, however, are those concerted numbers which reflect less tumultuous emotions. Such are the lovely female chorus for the maidens at the well, the exquisitely tender farewell to David on his flight from the jealous wrath of Saul, and the noble lament which brings the work to a conclusion.

THE GUARDIAN.

What a wealth of rare and noble qualities, unattainable by the most conscientious student, are to be found in the new oratorio! It is exceedingly dramatic, as becomes so moving a history; it excels in truth and variety of musical characterisation; it has strength that never degenerates into violence, and tenderness that is void of sentimentality; it has a rich vein of broad and noble melody, and a splendid mastery of all the possibilities of choral expression.

THE ATHENÆUM.

No more ambitious or elevated work by an English composer has ever been presented at a provincial festival. This is high praise, but no reverse argument could be easily sustained.

From Sir JOHN STAINER to Mr. B. BLAXLAND.

From Dr. C. H. H. PARRY to Mr. BLAXLAND.

"I am glad to have the opportunity of saying that Master Sterndale Bennett, who sang the part of first child in 'Judith' at the Chester Festival, did it most admirably. It has never been better done. He showed remarkable intelligence in phrasing and expression, and I am also indebted to you for giving him such an excellent idea of it. I am very glad I am going to have him for the 'Shepherd Boy' in 'Job,' at Leeds."—Nov. 10, 1894.

"Writing just after the splendid performance of 'Job,' at Leeds, I am most glad to say Sterndale Bennett acquitted himself surprisingly well in the 'Shepherd's' music, and sang with remarkable intelligence and refined feeling, and gave just the right declamation to give the part true effect. (Signed) "C. H. Parry."

"We have great pleasure in cordially endorsing the above.

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

In the ordering of Providence the time came, on Tuesday morning, the 20th ult., for Anton Rubinstein to go the way whence he will not return. There appears to have been little serious premonition of the fatal hour. The patient knew that his heart was affected, but men threatened in that manner often live long, and it may be that he anticipated yet some years of life and labour. Suddenly, in the drear dead of night, rang out the "clear call," and the famous musician departed. "At midnight," telegraphed a correspondent of the Daily News, "he went upstairs to his room, where he lay down on his bed. At one o'clock he cried for help, and in a feeble voice called for a doctor. Everybody ran to his room, and rubbed his hands and feet. He lost consciousness, however, before the doctor arrived, and about two o'clock his head fell back and he was dead." May he rest in peace.

It is the duty of Rubinstein's survivors not only to mourn their loss, but to estimate, as far as may be, its extent and character. For a final verdict this, however, is not the time. As Mr. Chamberlain once happily said, when referring to Mr. Gladstone, you must stand at some distance from a great man in order to see him fully and in his true proportions. So it is in the present case; nevertheless, we may, each of us, contribute to a contemporary, if not an ultimate verdict, and leave it for the consideration of those who will in the last instance decide.

Rubinstein came of an oppressed race. Even now the lot of a Russian Jew is not an ideal one, but it was much worse under the fierce sceptre of Nicholas I. Before that autocrat ascended the throne, "the Jews," says Mr. McArthur, "were prohibited from holding any position in the State, from living in or travelling to any town as they wished; from buying land; from educating their children, and, except by the payment of enormous fines, most of the avenues of commerce were shut to them. They were then, as now, the legal prey of every dishonest member of the State; they had no rights, no redress, and no justice dealt them, and in all the ways an autocratic government leaves open they were plundered and oppressed systematically." When Alexander I. died, the whips with which he chastised his Jewish subjects were exchanged for the scorpions of his successor. Nicholas, we are told, "detested the whole race," and when he issued a decree of renewed confiscation and oppression, one Jewish family, at least, took a serious resolution. There was quite a clan of Rubinsteins in the district of Moldavia now identified with the birth of Anton, and at the head of them stood the musician's grandfather, Roman Rubinstein. Calling his tribe of sixty people together, this patriarch told them what should be done under the new circumstances. Roman was not the stuff of which martyrs are made. He had, we may suppose, a Jew's reverence for the ancient faith; but he had, we know, a Jew's love of money. Wherefore he commanded his family to change their creed, and is reported to have said: "Better undergo the ordeal of holy water and chrism and become Christians—if holy water and chrism can make us Christians—than lose our wealth." The order was obeyed; the Rubinsteins were received into the Orthodox Church, and the consequences to one of their number, a child of twelve months, were immense.

It cannot be supposed, if there be anything in heredity, that the condition of his people was without effect upon Anton Rubinstein. It must have affected his temperament and character in some degree; but we are now most concerned with the result of the family apostacy, which opened up channels theretofore closed. Anton's father removed to Moscow, and set up in business as a manufacturer of pencils. According to the authority already cited, "Anton was then five years old, a bright little fellow with tangled curls falling about his shoulders and over into his serious eyes, who sang to himself all day long, and when his mother went to the pianoforte to play, she noticed how the little fellow stood by her side listening attentively." He was emphatically the son of his mother, a German Jewess known, in her maiden days, as Clara Levenston. The Rubinsteins had no music in them, but this woman gave to their blood an artistic strain, and it was she who not only transmitted musical instincts and feeling to her son, but recognised the first symptoms of their presence. It is an old story—how the mother taught her boy; how the child progressed with rapid strides, while the father looked on but half approvingly. At this time it does not appear that any idea of a professional career was entertained; Anton being probably regarded as the destined manager of the pencil factory. But the force of circumstances was away from the factory altogether, and at ten years of age Anton Rubinstein played the pianoforte in public; the place being Petrowsky Park, Moscow; the witnesses, a "wildly enthusiastic audience." This event was the beginning of the career which has just ended. Thenceforth, the art of music had among its professors a new and striking individuality.

It is not our purpose to go step by step through the story of Rubinstein's life. Biographical particulars are readily accessible, and we shall at the present moment be better employed in an attempt to estimate the artistic character and significance of the musician whom we have just lost. It is not necessary to say much of Rubinstein as a man. It may be that, to Englishmen, apart from a few intimates, he did not show himself in the best light. He belonged to a race generally credited with a disinclination to forgive, and he certainly never forgot the hostile criticism in which the English press—or an influential part of it—indulged when he came to this country in 1857. It is not our business to challenge or defend that criticism, which, if mistaken, was probably honest enough; but the iron of it entered Rubinstein's soul, and, no doubt, inspired many of the contemptuous remarks about music in England that fell from his lips. Hostile feeling and natural resentment apart, Rubinstein appears to have been personally gracious and even lovable, though ill-balanced, or, as an admirer puts it, "contradictory." "No man has ever had a warmer heart," writes Mr. McArthur; "no man has oftener had more generous or tender impulses; yet when necessity arises no man can count the cost more deliberately, or be firmer against all sentiment. "All his life long," continues the same writer, "Rubinstein has given away vast sums to needy musicians and artists"; yet, on becoming director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory, he sent away two hundred incompetent students without hesitation. A pessimist and an agnostic, Rubinstein is said not to have been a happy man, but report credits him with bonhomie in social life. He was "fond of a good story, especially when highly flavoured; a game of cards or billiards; and never so happy as when paying compliments to a pretty woman." The last-named source of delight he drew from sometimes in unconventional ways, as when telling the Princess of Wales that he was delighted to see her because she looked lovely. On the whole, it would seem that Rubinstein was very much a creature of caprice—an uncertain man, and uncomfortable of approach, yet good at heart and often moved by generous impulses.

The temperament which controlled him as a man necessarily influenced him as a pianist. In that capacity he had the defect of his qualities, and we must recognise the fact, not being of those hero-worshippers who refuse to see in their golden idol the least admixture of clay. Thus it is impossible for us to accept wrong notes because, according to one eulogist, Rubinstein could give them a "conception, a form, an ideal," whatever, in connection with wrong notes, that statement may mean. We take the great pianist's frequent departures from accuracy not as slips to be condoned because of "a conception, a form, an ideal," but as an indication that he was more and better than a virtuoso, whose aim is to excel in technical skill and correctness. There was in Rubinstein, as an executant, the material for half-a-dozen ordinary virtuosi; but deeper, and more inward than splendid mechanism, lay controlling feelings and impulses which often, in their hot strife for full expression, put the mechanism out of joint. Listening to his Titanic reading of some fiery work, we have recalled Shakespeare's lines—

> Now, by heaven,
> My blood begins my safer guides to rule,
> And passion, having my best judgment collied,
> Assays to lead the way.

It was at such moments that the mechanism went wrong, and false notes bestrewed the platform in numbers sufficient, as he once jokingly said, "to make a concerto." In Rubinstein, therefore, we had precisely the opposite of the prim performer who, cold and passionless, reproduces the notes with the accuracy of a telephone, and with about as much warmth in the process of transmission. We can hardly censure one or the other. Man—the pianoforte playing man forms no exception—is a creature of temperament, and it may be that varieties of temperament are as necessary in music as presumably they are in humanity at large.

Than Rubinstein there never was a more frank and honest performer. It is not conceivable that he studied "readings" and adopted those which commended themselves to his judgment. No such process, we may be sure, was resorted to in his case. The man played as he was moved, not by an intellectual perception, but by an emotional impulse. It was sufficient to bring a sympathetic work into contact with him in order to excite a blazing demonstration. The artist thrust himself, warm and glowing, into the piece he undertook to play, and both went on together in a full tide of passion. It has often been urged that the result was Rubinstein rather than, say, Beethoven. That is hardly a fair way of putting the case. The result was Beethoven as Rubinstein felt him. It was a great composer seen through the medium of a great executant musician. If we did not always approve, it was right to say so as a matter of personal taste; but no words against the great and saving principle that every artist should show us the composer, not, necessarily, as he is conventionally presented, or as some other executant limns him, but as he is felt by the actual interpreter. In many cases, no doubt, the result is less valuable than a mere intellectual expression, but failures do not invalidate a rule which, in the case of really great artists, leads to precious revelations. Rubinstein was not always the Thunderer. His march through a programme was not ever like that of an American forest fire, blackening and consuming with fierce heat and flame. Who that has heard him play the quaint and formal music of an earlier time, or some pretty trifle from a contemporary pen, to say nothing of works in which the great masters toy daintily with their art, can ever forget the wonderful command of delicate tone, the finished delivery, the absolute perfection in all things? His lyrics, so to speak, were as pure in their beauty as his more dramatic utterances were overwhelming in their sometimes irregular force. As a pianist Rubinstein must always be regarded as one apart. He belonged to no school, and he founded no school. He was the embodiment of individuality in art, and, unless Nature uses once more the mould in which she cast him, we shall never see his like.

As a composer, the Russian master presents a study which is not quite easy. In that capacity he has been to us a pathetic figure, working out vast designs and seeking to gratify large ambitions in the midst of a generation which looked upon his creations with indifference. Ten operas that are not played, and five Biblical dramas which are rarely heard—what toil do not these works represent; what disappointment; or, perhaps, what faith in the justice of the future! And, through the years of unrealised expectations, how silently and proudly the composer bore himself. Some other men would have made the world ring with their remonstrances, their prayers for help, their abuse of rivals whom the world preferred to themselves. Rubinstein, whatever he may have thought and felt, kept back both thought and feeling with a restraint by no means uncommon in the annals of music, but on that account none the less sublime. Apparently he never lost heart, knowing that the verdict of to-day may be upset by to-morrow's court of appeal, and hoping, doubtless, for ultimate success. The question of the exact position which Rubinstein's operas and larger works should take will, now that the composer is dead, soon be settled in the rough and ready way of a hurried public. Musicians will act more carefully; refraining alike from hasty condemnation and from such rash assertions as that "when much of the music of our time has passed away or sunk into oblivion, our children and our children's children will be honouring and enjoying the works and the genius of Anton Rubinstein." Prophecy is dangerous, and retrospect, in this case, gives no encouragement. For some reason or other, Rubinstein's musical dramas, Biblical and secular, have failed with the public, not in one land only, but in all. Though large in conception, striking in design, and worked out with full musical means, they do not, to use an expressive Americanism, "catch on." The fact may be no argument against the merit of the works, but it is a fact and therefore a stubborn thing, not to be explained away as the result of chance, or a consequence of Rubinstein's residence in Russia instead of in Germany. Our own opinion, long since formed and strengthened by time, is that Rubinstein lacked a strong dramatic instinct. Lyrical he was to the tips of his fingers, as scores of beautiful compositions attest; but his grip of a dramatic situation, and his command of powerful, condensed expression, seem to us weak enough to explain much of his non-success. The composer is earnest, and lavish of means, but somehow he does not convince. The public listen curiously, applaud conventionally, and forget speedily. It has been said that strong dramatic feeling is not a characteristic of Jewish musicians, although Meyerbeer wrote the famous duet in "Les Huguenots," and it is true that, in this respect, they have not generally excelled. Without discussing the wider question, it would appear that Rubinstein was insufficiently endowed with an operatic composer's most essential quality—the quality by force of which Mascagni, a musician not worthy to tie Rubinstein's shoe, goes through Europe in blazing triumph.

Rubinstein composed six Symphonies and five Pianoforte Concertos, to say nothing of quintets, quartets, and other works for the chamber. Here, again, his more ambitious flights are short of the mark which means unquestionable success. All his power was put into the "Ocean" Symphony, one of the longest works of the kind in existence, but its hold upon the public is at best precarious. Alike in subject and character, the "Ocean" represents the grandiose conceptions of its composer, who was never slow to challenge the most exacting tasks. To this particular work, it is plain, he attached the utmost importance, if, indeed, he did not regard it as his greatest legacy to the modern orchestra. Yet Rubinstein must have felt that the mark aimed at had been missed; and to this cause we attribute the additions made to the original, as though to fill some void, or complete an expression which, with such a theme, could never be other than imperfect. We do not venture to foretell the ultimate fate of the "Ocean" Symphony, but its present lack of appreciation is ominous. All of us must remember the slight effect made by a recent performance under the direction of Mr. Henschel, and how critics who agree in little else found the work lacking in those great qualities which are the passport to immortality. Taking the case of the "Ocean" as representative of the composer's more ambitious efforts, it would appear that he over-estimated his powers, not, we should say, in a spirit of vain-glory (Rubinstein did not possess that), but honestly; impelled by a feeling for the colossal and the grand which he was incompetent to express with necessary clearness and power. Most men have had a similar experience in some form or other, and can recall conceptions before which their capacity of expression seemed weakness itself.

The conclusion just arrived at is fairly supported by the unquestionable success of Rubinstein's smaller works—his songs, pianoforte pieces, and other compositions in the nature of chamber music. We do not expect a finished painter of cabinet pictures to win equal fame in the vast manner of a Michael Angelo. Artists always have their limitations within the realm of their particular art, though it is not always that they are conscious of them. With due submission to the verdict of a later time, it may be said that the genius of Rubinstein was restricted to the comparatively small area of the cabinet picture. To express this belief is not to derogate from his claims as a master. Art is not measured by the area upon which it works—not determined by computation of feet, square or cubic—for there may be as much genius and skill, even as much power and grandeur, in a little picture by Meissonier as in a wall-covering Horace Vernet. Let us always keep art separate from dimension. A great musician, then, appears to us in the smaller productions of the composer whom now we mourn. Who does not feel this? Those who are familiar with their Rubinstein can call to mind many a masterpiece of a few pages, in which the art is perfect, the charm complete; in which—the Persian Songs, for example—music becomes magic and enchants us with an ideal otherwise seen but in happy dreams. It would serve little purpose to multiply instances of this class, for here we are on ground which the musical reader knows—in a fragrant garden, the perfumes of which are familiar. Well, is it not something—is it not much—to be a great composer for the home and the chamber, one whom amateurs admit to closest communion, to be a household musician, and a source of intimate artistic delights which are far better and more satisfying than those shared in common with a crowd? Such was Rubinstein and such he will remain, whatever future generations may determine in the matter of his larger works. Being that, we may all place a wreath upon his grave, with gratitude for benefits received.

Joseph Bennett.

FROM MY STUDY.

The Musical Times portrait gallery is, this month, enriched with "counterfeit presentments" of Guiditta Pasta and Joanna Wagner, artists of whom all the world has heard, but concerning whom, perhaps, little is generally known, so rapidly does Time obliterate the traces of those who have passed from among the living. Yet both won and retained for many years a brilliant position, and were, alike in vocal attainments and in that order of fame which comes to the prima donna, among the most distinguished examples of a necessarily restricted class. As Madame Pasta appeared in London as late as 1850, there are many among us who can remember her. The veteran critic and litterateur, Mr. Sutherland Edwards, is one of them. Mr. Edwards heard and saw the great artist in 1837, when, as he tells us, he "was far too young to be impressed by her," while, in 1850, she was "far too old to impress me." From him, therefore, we obtain little information based upon personal experience, failing which it is needful to fall back upon common report as it has come down to us. Pasta was not one of the prime donne who make a name in a night, soaring into the heavens like a rocket. She rose, like Pauline Lucca, from the ranks, and began her career, after two years' study in the Milan Conservatoire, by playing in the smaller theatres of Italy. Marrying at eighteen, she came to Paris in the train of Catalani, there meeting the English manager, Ayrton, by whom she and her husband were engaged at the joint salary of £400 for the season. The remuneration was small, and so was Pasta's success. People talked of her Cherubino, and Mr. Edwards points out that certain critics "recognised in her the germs of great talent." Her manager, unluckily for him, was not so sharp sighted. He declined to re-engage the young Italian, and lived to regret it.

When next Pasta came to this country (King's Theatre, 1824), she had the operatic world at her feet, Manager Ayrton included. We talk of strong companies in our day, but what should we say if Sir Augustus Harris presented to us, in a single season, half-a-dozen sopranos equivalent to Colbran-Rossini, Catalani, De Begnis, Vestris, Caradori, and Pasta? Ayrton had all these, and the King's Theatre was ablaze with their splendour. Pasta made her re-entry as Desdemona in Rossini's "Otello" (then a new work), and Ebers tells us àpropos: "Nothing could have been more free from trick or affectation. There is no perceptible effort to resemble the character she plays; on the contrary, she comes upon the stage the character itself transposed into the situation, excited by the hopes and the fears, breathing the life and spirit of the being she represents." This is high praise, and other witnesses give evidence to the same effect. Pasta's pay was as high as the praise. In 1817, she played the season for £400, with her husband thrown in; seven years later her terms were £14,000 for the same period. As for the manager, he shut up the theatre and advertised its contents for sale. This done, nobody was surprised to see a fresh start made the next year by a new impresario, with Pasta's name again in the prospectus. The famous artist was in London for the season of 1828, then distinguishing herself by playing Otello to the Desdemona of Madame Sontag; the music being, of course, transposed and otherwise adapted. Her acting, on that occasion, is said to have been "impressive and even terrifying," so largely had her dramatic powers developed. "Before Pasta's time," writes Mr. Edwards, "the Italian singers contented themselves with the conventional expression, the mechanical gesticulation by which operatic singing will always be more or less disfigured; so difficult is it to find vocal and histrionic talent combined in the same artist. But when Pasta had once shown how beautiful music might be rendered intensely dramatic, the singers of her time were obliged, as best they could, to follow her example."

The famous artist visited England occasionally between 1828 and 1839. It is said that later on she lost her fortune through the failure of a bank, and, with impaired means, had to continue before the public in order to obtain the wherewithal to support herself in old age. Be that as it may, she remained too long on the stage. Born at Como in 1798, she died there in 1865.

Joanna Wagner, born at Hanover, in October, 1828, was a daughter of Albert Wagner, brother of the much more famous Richard. Albert was at that time a professor of singing in Würtzburg, and there his child received her early training; there, also, she made a very early first appearance, playing the Child in a drama by Ifland when only five years old. At ten she took part in several of the fairy pieces then popular, and at thirteen received her first regular engagement, making her début as the Page in "Les Huguenots."

In 1846 the young artist placed herself under Manuel Garcia, and profited in other ways by residence in Paris, then the artistic centre of the world. Subsequent success at Hamburg and elsewhere made Joanna Wagner a conspicuous figure, and led us to a comedy which is now better remembered than the lady's singing—in this country, at any rate. Young readers may, however, know little of a squabble which once convulsed operatic London, and I will advert to its main incidents.

In 1850 a certain Dr. Bacher became acquainted with Joanna Wagner, and sought to obtain for her an engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre, then managed by Mr. Lumley. The manager's draft agreement being found to contain a stipulation that the artist should not appear at private concerts, the Wagners objected, struck out the clause, and returned the paper with their signatures attached. Lumley, however, would not hear of the change, whereupon Bacher, as agent for the other party, accepted the original conditions. The document, signed by manager and agent, was forwarded to Joanna and acknowledged by her as an agreement binding. She and her father subsequently declared that there was an understanding, according to which the debated clause would be made "all right" on their arrival in London. Mr. Lumley repudiated the existence of such a reservation. The Wagners further alleged that the contract was void because a certain advance sum was not paid by Lumley on the day stipulated. The money was actually tendered on April 5, but as long before that date as March 5 the Wagners were negotiating with Mr. Gye for an engagement on higher terms, that step being quite in harmony with the pronounced opinion of Albert Wagner (who appears to have been as cynical as his brother) that England was only to be valued for her money. The engagement concluded, Gye announced the début of Joanna.

At this point Lumley invoked the law, and obtained an ex parte injunction in Chancery against the artist's appearance pending the hearing of the case and judgment. The hearing came on in due course and judgment was given in favour of Lumley. Commenting upon this, the Daily News said that the sympathies of the public were on the side of the young lady who had been the unwilling cause of the contest. Possibly Joanna was but a puppet in the hands of her advisers, and these heard a great deal of English plain-speaking. The Times remarked: "The simple truth of this long trial is that Mdlle. Joanna Wagner and her excellent parent thought that the second bargain was better than the first and, therefore, endeavoured to repudiate their own act. It is a shabby business, and the sooner, for Mdlle. Wagner's sake, it is forgotten the better. At the same time, it is clear enough that the fault lies, not with the young girl, but with the sordid circle around her, who were endeavouring to huckster her talents about the most profitable market, without regard to any considerations but those of £ s. d."

Though handed by Chancery over to Lumley, Joanna did not sing for him. Cruvelli just then ran away from Her Majesty's and the impresario, finding his position hopeless, gave up the fight. Joanna sang at the house just named in 1856, and, according to Lumley's "Reminiscences," "took the public by storm." "Was it possible," wrote the magnanimous director, "to listen and not feel every hostile feeling crushed?" Losing her voice in 1861, Miss Wagner, or, rather, Frau Landrath Jachmann, became an actress and had great success. She took leave of the stage in 1872, but subsequently appeared at Bayreuth on two occasions, singing, first, the solo alto part in the Ninth Symphony, and, next, playing one of the Norns in the production of the "Nibelung's Ring" in 1876. The artist's death, which occurred a few weeks ago, is, of course, fresh in mind.

I have lately examined with great interest a volume entitled "English County Songs, collected and edited by Lucy E. Broadwood and J. A. Fuller Maitland," and published by the Leadenhall Press. There are here a large number of folk-ditties, arranged under the counties to which they belong, the music being provided with a simple but sufficient pianoforte accompaniment. The editors have done more than unearth airs and verses racy of the soil—the rude strivings of native impulses and untrained powers towards artistic expression—they have indicated a rich field for further exploration. No one knows how rich it is, though this volume gives us some idea; and it is encouraging to learn that in some cases where the editors expected to discover little they found much. But the work must be done soon. The generation which loved and sang these quaint effusions is represented now only by a few lingerers whom Death has for the moment forgotten.

As a Gloucestershire man, I was disappointed in not finding our old county song, "George Ridler's Oven." This famous ditty figures in Hughes' "Scouring of the White Horse." The scourers, gamesters, and what not, were carousing in a booth on White Horse Hill, when—"the Doctor suddenly began, 'Now, farmer, you must do us a favour, and give us your famous old Gloucestershire song. I've been telling all our friends here about it, and they're keen to hear it.' 'S'pose you means Gaarge Ridler?' said the farmer. 'Of course,' said the Doctor. 'Well, I don't know as I've zung these score o' months,' said the farmer, 'but hows'mever, if you wants it here goes.' So the farmer finished his brandy and water, cleared his throat, balanced himself on the hind legs of his chair, cast up his eyes, and began—

Thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns,
Thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns, thaay stwuns.

"'What's he saying — what language?' whispered the tall scholar. 'Mad old party!' murmured the short scholar. 'Hush!' whispered the Doctor, 'that's the orthodox way to begin; don't put him out.' I could not tell what in the world to write [the narrator hoped to "take down" the song], but the farmer went on with growing emphasis—

Thaay stwuns (as before).

There was a moment's pause, during which the Doctor had much difficulty in keeping order; then the farmer got fairly under weigh, and went on—

Thaay stwuns that built Gaarge Ridler's oven,
Oh, thaay cum vrom the Blakeney Quar,
And Gaarge he were a jollv old man,
And his yead did graw above his yare!

So to the last verse—

When I gwoes dead, as it may hap,
My grave shall be under the good yale-tap;
Wi vaulded earmes ther' wool I lie,
Cheek by jowl, my dog and I."

Should the editors of "County Songs" bring out a supplementary volume, it is to be hoped they will not forget "George Ridler's Oven."

Looking up some particulars concerning Rubinstein, the other day, I found that, after defining a work of art as one "in which mere science ceases to be the prescribed standard, and spiritual emotion asserts itself," he refers to our English composers, Bull and Byrd, as attempting the artistic for the virginal and clavecin, and further declares that the beginnings of pianoforte music are discoverable in this country. Noting these remarks of the now departed musician, I remembered a curious eulogy of Byrd from the pen of his contemporary, John Baldwin. The last-named, a Windsor lay-clerk and a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, made a manuscript collection of Motets, now the property of the Queen, and supplemented as well as prefaced it by some rhymed verses, in which he mentioned the composers upon whom he had drawn.

The worthy gentleman begins by proclaiming the merit of the collection he had made. Calling it "a store-house of treasure," he goes on:

there is here no badd songe : but the best can be hadd :
the cheefest from all men : yea there is not one badd :
and such sweete musicke : as doth much delite yeelde :
both unto men at home : and birds abroad in fielde :

Paying due homage to native composers like Tye and Tallis, and making respectful mention "even of straingers also," John gives himself up to patriotic pride and William "Birde." "Let not straingers bragg," says our sturdy Englishman—nor they these soe commende, for they maye now geve place : and set themselves behinde an Englishe man, by name : William Birde for his skill :

which I should have sett first : for soe it was my will :
whose greate skill and knowledge : dothe excelle all at this time :
and farre to strange countries : abroade his skill dothe shine :

Baldwin admits the existence of formidable rivals in other lands—

famus men be abroade : and skilful in the arte :
I doe confesse the same : and will not from it starte :
but in Europp is none : like to our Englishe man :
which doth so farre exceede : as trulie I it scan :

Dwelling on the pre-eminence of his hero, Baldwin continues:

the rarest man hee is : in musick's worthye arte :
that now on earthe dothe live : I speak it from my harte :
or heere to fore hathe bene : or after him shall come :
none such I feare shall rise : that may be calde his sonne :

At this point the writer bursts into apostrophe:

O famus man of skill : and judgemente greate profounde :
lett heaven and earthe ringe out : thy worthye praise to sownde :
nay lett thy skill it selfe : thy worthie fame recorde :
to all posteritie : thy due deserte afforde :
and lett them all which heere : of thy greate skill then saie :
fare well, fare well, thou prince : of musicke now and aye :

Baldwin himself says farewell very heartily:

fare well I saie fare well : fare well and heere I end :
fare well melodious Birde : fare well sweete musick's frende :

After repudiating any design to flatter, the writer thus concludes:

Soe heere I end fare well : comittinge all to God :
who kepe us in His grace : and shelde us from His rodd.

"Amen" to that prayer, John, and many thanks for such artless lines of honest appreciation. X.

A RECORD OF THE VIENNA EXHIBITION.*

This important work is a revised translation of a German edition already published, and comprises a collection of essays suggested by the varied contents of the most important Musical and Dramatic Exhibition that has yet been formed, together with illustrations of the diversified contents, rare musical instruments, autographic fac-similes of the most illustrious composers, dramatic authors, actors, singers, and instrumental performers; and portraits of Imperial and other eminent persons whose patronage, and in many instances actual service, facilitated the successful fulfilment of this cosmopolitan scheme.

There was a description of the leading features of the Exhibition in The Musical Times of September, 1892. In scope and dimensions it as far surpassed the Loan Collection attached to the Inventions Exhibition in 1885, shown in the Royal Albert Hall, as that gathering exceeded the special collection in 1872 that was at South Kensington Museum. But in looking back there was a foreshadowing of Vienna at the Royal Albert Hall, inasmuch as, for the first time, a comprehensive scheme was inaugurated and carried out that embraced with the instruments everything that was connected with the art of music—portraits and paintings generally, books, manuscripts, engravings, historic rooms; all, in short, that could illustrate music. Even historical performances were given which have since borne rich fruit. At Vienna, however, the Drama first found such illustration, and if this side of the Exhibition was less well carried out than the musical, any shortcoming must be put down to novelty, already a past phase where music was concerned.

It is well known that the idea of the Vienna Exhibition of 1892 emanated from the Princess Metternich, and chiefly through her influence its realisation was brought about. As is fitting, there is in this book a full-page portrait of the Princess. The various essays which form the substance of it have been contributed by the leading representatives of the different nationalities met with in the Exhibition, of which this book is the monument and more, as it is intended to promote critical, archæological, and historical studies of its material. The first essay, by the Viennese editor, Dr. Schneider, supplies the story of the Exhibition from its initiation. It will suffice to name a few of the principal contributors of reputation who have assisted him. Dr. Guido Adler, of Prague, has devoted himself to the special section lent by the Imperial family. The German section has been treated by Herr Schröer, of Berlin. Musicography and a collection of musical instruments lent by the Archduke Franz Ferdinand have found an exponent in Professor Koller, of Vienna. The Development of Vocal Music in Germany is by Dr. Sandberger, of Munich. The old musical instruments from Berlin are described by Dr. Fleischer. Bach and Beethoven are the subjects of a dissertation, also comprehending Handel and the famous Viennese composers, by Dr. Rietsch, of

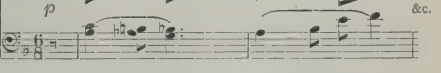
* The International Exhibition for Music and the Drama, Vienna, 1892. Edited by A. J. Hipkins, F.S.A., London; Morris Steinert, Newhaven, Connecticut, U.S.A.; and Siegmund Schneider, Vienna. (Moritz Perles, Vienna, 1894.)

Vienna; the autographic illustrations to this article being most interesting. There are full-page illustrations of the interiors or rooms in the building devoted to Mozart and Beethoven; in the latter is seen the grand pianoforte by Broadwood which Beethoven owned from 1818 until he died (it is now in the National Museum at Budapest, a bequest from Liszt who had it for years at Weimar), and an Erard grand pianoforte upon which Beethoven used to play when at Prince Lichnowski's. J. S. Bach, with special reference to the clavichord, has fallen to the lot of Mr. Steinert, of Newhaven, U.S.A., well-known for his large collection of specimens of that now rare instrument. He has also written a long notice, well illustrated, of his remarkable collection of keyboard instruments of all kinds, but in connection with the development of the modern pianoforte—the American pianoforte in particular. The romantic period in music concerns Weber, Mendelssohn and Schumann, Wagner and Liszt, with ample illustrations, and is by Dr. Schneider, who also gives an interesting chapter concerning Wagner and the Princess Metternich. Chopin and the Polish section are discussed, all too briefly, by Dr. Nossig, of Paris. An illustration shows a collection of portraits of the men and women who were near Chopin in his Paris life, and a pianoforte with its seat that belonged to him. In the French Dramatic section there is a room dedicated to Alexandre Dumas, whose writing table and elbow-chair have for a pendant a Pleyel grand pianoforte that was Chopin's—the Funeral March accompanying "Les Trois Mousquetaires"!—but, notwithstanding some incongruity, there is no real hiatus, for Paris binds together all genius. Young Italy finds appreciation under the heading of Pietro Mascagni and the Sonzognini, from Dr. Marsop, of Munich. Even Spain, that refused London in 1885, was unable to withstand the appeal of the Princess Metternich; the Spanish section is treated by Dr. Beer. The Italian, French, and English Loan sections are respectively discussed by Professor Perwin, the Ritter von Eisenhof, and Mr. A. J. Hipkins. The display of theatrical costumes from Paris was in itself a liberal education. The German Drama and Theatre Decoration are treated by Dr. Trautmann, of Munich, which, in connection with the excellent Russian Dramatic section, broke fresh ground. Herr Ranzoni, of the Neue Freie Presse, and Herr Teuber, of the Fremdenblatt, describe the Exhibition Theatre and its performances. There are also interesting articles upon the Viennese Harlequinade by Dr. Radler, and by Dr. Plöhn upon renowned collectors and collections. The Viennese Waltz alone seems to have escaped the notice of the Direction of this grand enterprise; we miss a subject so characteristic of Vienna and the Viennese. The laborious translation into English is the achievement of a lady, Fräulein Rosa Wohlmuth, whose name is a metaphor for the cheerful accomplishment of a task of more than ordinary difficulty, on account of the burdensome technicalities unavoidable in such a work.

A SOUVENIR: RUBINSTEIN.

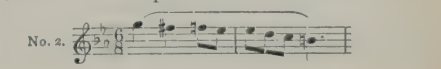
A melancholy interest attaches to a set of six pianoforte pieces from the pen of Anton Rubinstein, entitled "Souvenir de Dresde," and just published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. It is fitting that these should come to us at the present moment, when men, besides mourning the loss of the composer, are discussing his definite position in the ranks of music, and that they should represent a form in which, by general agreement, the deceased master appears at his best. The works before us convey Rubinstein's ripest thoughts in the matter of music for his own instrument, and it must be that amateurs of the pianoforte will scan them with high expectation, as well as no less pronounced curiosity.

The first piece is an Andante (F major, 6-8), in what is called Aria form, having, as its specific designation, the word "Simplicitas." Its first section contains a principal theme, tuneful, unaffected, and altogether engaging:—



The second part of the theme breaks into ripples, like a hitherto placid brook when wind stirs its surface; this change being preparatory to a middle episode (con moto assai) in which there is a steady rush of scale passages and arpeggios for both hands. If we may continue the figure of a stream, it is here that the current enters an open reach, where the wind is strongest, and wavelets chafe against the banks. A distinct note of passion sounds in this episode, working up to a very vigorous and impetuous climax, then sinking rapidly, as in exhaustion. A return is duly made to the tranquil opening theme, which comes with delightful effect. In the Coda there is a brief reminiscence of the turbulent episode—the last rumble of a storm that has passed.

No. 2, "Appassionata" (Allegro assai, C minor, 6-8), bids us, seeing who is the composer, prepare for a display of vehement emotion. Looking for this, we are not disappointed. There is no regular melody in the leading section, but, out of a turmoil of "figures" and broken chords, comes now and then the subjoined acute complaint—



—a genuine wail of distress. The usual middle episode (Moderato, C major) very strongly suggests Schumann, but is none the worse on that account. It furnishes a pleasant change from the passion which precedes it, and also follows it; for soon the leading section returns, with all its violence and complaining cries, the latter now more developed and worked in the left hand as well as the right. Again Rubinstein makes his Coda recall the episode.

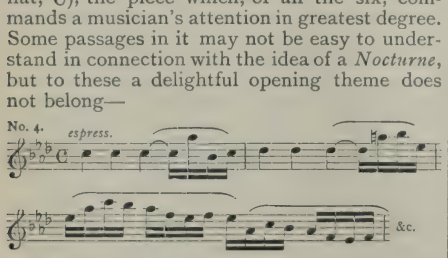
The third piece, styled "Novellette" (Moderato con moto, A major, 6-8, 2-4), is charming in its very waywardness, and as little to be depended on as a spoilt child. At the outset very well behaved indeed—it soon begins to show temper — strenuous progressions, jerky rhythmical figures, abrupt tonal transitions, and then a wild outburst of arpeggios, followed by a sudden return to sedateness. The episode, in A minor, is quite engaging, and includes a lively little Scherzando —the child is at play. A piece of considerable length closes with a return of the innocent and gentle leading subject.

No. 4 is a Caprice (Presto, C major, 3-8, 2-8). While bearing a general resemblance to many other pieces of the same class, it boasts a distinctive feature due to rhythmical device. Thus there are sudden changes from 3-4 to 2-4, or one hand plays in the first rhythm while the other is engaged with the second. This is, of course, quite legitimate Caprice, in which a composer may dance not only without fetters, but with wings to his heels.

We now come to a Nocturne (Moderato, A flat, C), the piece which, of all the six, commands a musician's attention in greatest degree. Some passages in it may not be easy to understand in connection with the idea of a Nocturne, but to these a delightful opening theme does not belong—



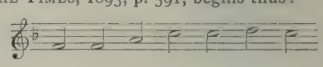
The first two bars, in which is the real melodic thought, are very daintily varied in course of treatment, and the whole section turns out to be of great interest and charm. By way of middle episode we have an Allegro in F minor, 3-4, itself presenting two contrasted sections, the first being a moto continuo of quaver triplets. As though not quite sure of himself here, the composer soon reverts to the leading theme, about which there can be no doubt at all. The Nocturne will surely and speedily find its way into English concert-rooms.

Turning to the last piece, we find a Polonaise (Moderato, E flat minor, 3-4), which opens, after a call to attention, with one of those half gay, half melancholy themes which in Polish music are wholly pathetic—

The continuation is a good deal elaborated, without disturbing the impression made at the outset. Coming to the middle section (B flat major) the music is found to have exchanged its note of sadness for one of confidence and pride. One can hear the martial rhythms that acclaim a victor. This is but transient. Melancholy returns, deepening at one time almost to despair, and so going on to a solemn close.

Such, in briefest terms, is the work which, of its kind, may be regarded as the late master's "swan song." Sympathy and appreciation will surely attend it.

In a series of articles on the history and customs of the Mastersingers that appeared in The Musical Times a twelvemonth ago, stress was laid upon the many evidences contained in Wagenseil's "Buch von der Meister-Singer holdseligen Kunst," tending to show that this was largely drawn upon by Wagner when writing his music-comedy, "Die Meistersinger." By a curious oversight, one of the most interesting of all these indications escaped the writer's notice. As an example of a famous Mastersong, Wagenseil gives in his book a rhymed version of the twenty-ninth chapter of Genesis, set to the four "Crowned Tones" of Mügling, Frauenlob, Marner, and Regenbogen. The first of these, which is quoted in full in The Musical Times, 1893, p. 591, begins thus:



The resemblance of this to the opening phrase of the Mastersingers' march in Wagner's comedy is too obvious to be a mere coincidence:—

This is no new discovery, being commented on in Tiersot's "Histoire de la Chanson Populaire en France" and elsewhere, but it will probably be new to many admirers of "Die Meistersinger."

Germany is now celebrating the four-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Hans Sachs, the greatest of the Mastersingers, who was born on November 5, 1494. In celebration of the event, the Church of St. Katherine, formerly attached to the convent of that name, but disused since the Reformation, is to be turned into a "Hans Sachs Museum," instead of being used as a lumber-room where theatrical properties belonging to the Town Theatre are stowed away. As a matter of fact, the Nuremberg Masters in the time of Sachs used to meet in another church, that of St. Martha, in the Königsstrasse, not far from the Frauenthor; but since Wagner's music-comedy "Die Meistersinger," it is impossible to dissociate Hans Sachs from the Church of St. Katherine, which, in fact, the Mastersingers made use of in later times. Another contribution to the celebration is the publication of a delightful volume, entitled "Hans Sachs und seine Zeit," by Rudolph Genée (Leipzig, 1894), in which the life of one of the most interesting of German cities in the sixteenth century is fully described, numerous illustrations adding to the value as well as the beauty of the volume. In an appendix are given several mastersongs by Sachs and other Nuremberg masters, among them one in "Beckmesser's New Tone."

Most readers of The Musical Times will already have heard, with regret, that, for reasons of health, Sir George Grove has resigned the Directorship of the Royal College of Music. The loss to that Institution is not easily to be measured even by those who most appreciate Sir George's merits. To his efforts in carrying out the designs of the Prince of Wales is due, in the first place, the foundation of the Royal College; and to his energy and tact the Institution owes its present unique position among the great Music Schools of the world. It is exceedingly doubtful if, at the time of its foundation, the Prince of Wales could have found anyone so fit for the work to be done as Sir George Grove. Possessed of sympathies too catholic to restrict themselves to any one clique or school; adding to wide culture and social influence, a keenly critical discrimination—the fruit of long musical experience and genuine artistic enthusiasm; and able to inspire equally the respect of teachers and the affection of pupils, "George Grove, of Sydenham, in the County of Kent, D.C.L." (as his title of appointment runs), was obviously the ideal Director for a national School of Music. His career, so varied and distinguished, had been precisely of the kind calculated to develop his artistic and administrative powers. He was trained originally as a civil engineer. The iron lighthouses on Morant Point, Jamaica, and Gibbs' Hill, Bermuda, and the assistance he rendered Robert Stevenson during the erection of the Chester and Holyhead Railway and Britannia Bridge are ample evidence of his practical skill. Succeeding Scott Russell in 1849 as secretary of the Society of Arts, he was appointed secretary of the newly-formed Crystal Palace Company early in 1852. To this fortunate circumstance the Crystal Palace owes its present status as a musical centre. To Sir George's initiative is due the appointment of Mr. August Manns as Conductor of the Crystal Palace Orchestra—a convincing proof of that quick discernment of merit which has served him so admirably on many other important occasions of his life. But in his new position the energetic secretary gave play to his activity in more than one direction. Mr. James Ferguson, then engaged in constructing the Nineveh Court at Sydenham, mentioned casually in Mr. Grove's presence the want of a Concordance to the proper names of the Bible. The hint was enough. In the pursuit of the necessary Biblical studies—more especially of topography and geography—he undertook two journeys to Palestine. The fruits of his researches are embodied in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," and to the impulse given by his industry we may attribute the formation of the Society now so widely known as the "Palestine Exploration Fund."

Meanwhile, the fame of the Crystal Palace Concerts spreading, Mr. Grove undertook the preparation and editorship of those analytical programmes which have made the initial [G.] famous throughout the English-speaking musical world. The peculiar merit of these charming and sympathetic little guides lay in their freedom from school jargon, and in the knowledge they exhibited not only of the works they so lovingly described, but of the requirements and difficulties of the amateur listener. That these qualities have been maintained to the present time in every fresh analysis from the same pen is a fact too well known to need emphasising. A little later there followed a period of "exploration" of another kind. A great admirer of Schubert, when that wonderful genius was scarcely known but as a song-writer, Mr. Grove was unceasing in his efforts to bring to light the orchestral works of the master, many of which were lying neglected and unpublished in a now famous Viennese cupboard. With this object he undertook, in 1867, a journey to Vienna, in which he was accompanied by Mr. (now Sir) Arthur Sullivan. The story of their adventures and ultimate success belongs to musical history, and may be found charmingly told in Sir George's appendix to the English translation of Kreissle von Hellborn's "Life of Schubert." Enough to say that the debt of Schubert-lovers to George Grove is never likely to be repaid.

From the year 1868, Sir George edited Macmillan's Magazine, and in 1875 gave up the secretaryship of the Crystal Palace to transfer his services to Messrs. Macmillan. Here we trace him by the "Primer of Geography," a little book much in request both at home and in the Colonies. His literary work culminates, of course, in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," so far the most comprehensive work of its kind in existence, and of which nothing need be said to the readers of The Musical Times. How little Sir George's modest designation of "Editor" on the title-page of this work does justice to his labours therein, is proved by the numerous articles bearing the familiar initial; amongst which his exhaustive and splendid biographies of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Schubert are perhaps the most valuable. These last are no mere compilations of previously published material, but have been elaborated ab initio—often from the original sources, and have necessitated many continental journeys. In 1875 the University of Durham conferred upon him the hon. degree of D.C.L.; then Glasgow added that of LL.D.; and in 1883, at the founding of the Royal College, which marks the crowning point of his career, Her Majesty confirmed by the honour of Knighthood the nation's appreciation of Sir George's numerous services to literature and art. The fruitfulness of his subsequent labours, which had long been acknowledged by all capable of forming an opinion, took tangible and permanent form last summer, when the new building of the Royal College of Music—made possible by the munificence of Mr. Samson Fox—was opened with all the pomp and ceremony befitting a national event. Sir George has since been made Companion of the Order of the Bath, in further recognition of his eminent services. That an increase of leisure is likely to encourage so indefatigable a worker to add substantially to these is a reflection of the pleasantest possible kind.

We have the greatest possible pleasure in stating that, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, the President of the College, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, has selected Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry as the new Director of the Royal College of Music. We are delighted to know that Dr. Parry has accepted the post, as it will be universally conceded that no other musician could so fitly occupy the position.

Just twenty years have elapsed since the genial poet-composer, Peter Cornelius, died in his native town of Mainz, at the comparatively early age of two score years and ten. His fellow-townsmen, and notably his fellow-artists of Mainz and the neighbourhood, combined to do honour to his memory a few weeks ago, in the erection of a memorial tablet on the house where he was born. The tablet is of polished marble, and bears the following inscription: "In this house (rebuilt 1863) the poet-composer, Peter Cornelius, was born 24 February, 1824; died 26 October, 1874. Erected by the Liederkranz of Mainz, 1894." That so long a period has passed away before this public honour has been done to his memory, must not be taken as a criterion of the esteem in which he is held in Germany. Those who knew the man, who knew his quiet unobtrusive life, and the honest, faithful way in which he did his work, not for fame or present success, but for the glory of music and poesy and under the impulse of true genius, without flourish of trumpets or any kind of posing before the world, will not wonder that the public recognition of his genius has taken twenty years to fructuate. It is no sign that he has been unappreciated until now—on the contrary, his works have been known and loved for years all over Germany—rather is the tardiness of this public recognition a voucher for its lastingness. Almost prophetically do his own words now read:

Few there are who understand me,
Who my inner meaning catch;
Who to words in lightness spoken
Can a deeper thought attach;
Who beneath a veil of jesting
Just the grain of truth descry:
He who from his soul createth
Labours hard and painfully.
Therefore, that ye thus have met me,
Thus have found the germ of good,
I would greet you, I would thank you,
Who my soul have understood.

These lines were quoted by the president of the Liedertafel in handing over to the Mayor of the town the monument, the erection of which has been set on foot, and thus successfully carried through, by the energy of that society. Meanwhile, how do we in England stand as regards Cornelius? A couple of quasi-amateur performances of his one comic opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," by the Royal College; a couple of performances of the Overture to the same at the Richter Concerts; a stray song of his—a mere landmark in the desert of concert songs—and how few know what a wealth of songs, genuine treasures both in their music and their poetry, are lying hid for a future generation to "find" and to enjoy? But cannot we, in our generation, do something? Here is this "Barber of Bagdad," for instance, ready at our very doors, having had a considerable initial success in the performances already alluded to. It is ready provided with an excellent English version (by the Rev. Marmaduke Browne); cannot the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, who are so alert to any successes on the German stage, see their way to giving us this opera? Will not the concert-singers take the trouble to look through the works of a man of genius and let us hear some more of them, in place of some of the hackneyed productions which we know so well?

Our correspondent, Mr. Ernest Bergholt, has received from Mr. D. B. Monro a communication throwing fresh light upon the Seikilos inscription. It seems that Mr. J. A. R. Munro, of Lincoln College, Oxford, was recently on a visit to Smyrna; and, while there, took a fresh impression from Professor Ramsay's little column, as well as a copy. The concluding musical symbol (⊐) was considered by Dr. Crusius to be a "pause" (diastole), denoting, like our 𝄐 over a double bar, the end of the piece. He might have adduced (but did not), as warranty for this interpretation, the "crescent" pause given by the second Anonymous Writer (Section xv.), which would have been a rounded variant of the symbol in question. According to Mr. Munro, however, this is in reality the final note of the composition (⌐), and the supposed tail is a slur written under the last three notes: such a slur as we find in Section xvi. of the same anonymous writer. The difference this makes in the inscription is important: it brings its scale exactly within the compass of the third species of octave, the so-called "Phrygian" (E to E with two sharps). Mr. D. B. Monro is therefore of opinion that the scale is that of A major (with G natural), and that the ending is on the dominant of the mode. We understand that Mr. Monro is thinking of having a printed slip on the subject inserted in those copies of his work on the Greek modes which still remain in the publishers' hands. The revised inscription will now run as follows:—

There has been a remarkable revival of interest in chamber music lately. At least, that is what one would be disposed to believe from seeing so many new announcements of schemes for chamber concerts. But why the undertakers should couch their prospectuses in such strong language it is not easy to understand. One speaks of the "priceless gems of English Art lying neglected at our feet," or words to that effect, and another begins thus: "Neglect and indifference have at all times been the black poison which has caused the untimely end of many a brilliant career," and goes on to allude to "machinations and intrigues which petty jealousy and narrow-minded schoolmasterdom often bring to bear upon the efforts of an independent mind." The picture here conjured up is so ludicrous that we could wish for the pen of our well-known contemporary "Dagonet" to throw off a little dramatic sketch of, say, the Cambridge and Edinburgh professors conspiring together in a secret vault to prevent poor Mr. John Smith's String Quartet from making his fortune. There is plenty of petty jealousy and not a little intriguing amongst operatic singers, but in any other department of music it is simply worth no one's while to machinate against anyone else. The reasons why chamber music is a neglected branch of art in England are so patent that we need not here trouble to state them; but, after all, the love of chamber music is not best cultivated by giving performances in large public halls. It is a kind of music only thoroughly effective in the chamber, or private room, and only to be thoroughly enjoyed even there by the performers themselves. To play string quartets in public is almost as unnatural as to play whist with onlookers.

TO AN ORGAN-GRINDER IN ITALY.

O grinder, grind serenely here,
Where this November sun is blazing
In this blue sky, divinely clear;
No thought of frost or snow, no fear
Of fogs which you would find amazing!

O grinder, love your native land!
Where in return your people love you,
Where your half-shaven face is tanned,
Your cheek by scented zephyrs fanned,
Where this blue sky is spread above you.

O grinder, Italy may be
A country in a sad condition!
Though poor, from taxes never free,
With endless claims, on land and sea,
For ships and men and ammunition.

O grinder, that is doubtless true!
Administration likewise lax is,
But still a pauper, such as you,
Must find the claims upon him few;
At least you pay no rates and taxes.

O grinder, having settled this,
Again I ask you to remember
The cobalt sky, which you would miss
In lands of less climatic bliss,
The summer sunshine in November!

O grinder, in that mighty town
Which you call Londra, things are grimy!
The sky is often blackish-brown,
And endless soots meander down,
To sink in mud all black and slimy.

O grinder, you might think that I Am not a patriotic Jingo!
And might in vain conjecture why
I bore you so about your sky,
If you could understand my lingo.

O grinder, think not ill of me;
I praise your land, its sky, and flowers,
And urge you not to cross the sea,
With some vague, frantic hope that we May never hear you grind in ours!

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Not long since, as may by some be remembered, I felt bound to protest against certain disparaging remarks made, by Mr. Finck of the New York Evening Post, on the assumption that I had written an anonymous article with which he disagreed. Since my protest appeared Mr. Finck has tendered a sincere apology, and with that, of course, the incident ends. The matter has a moral, pointing to the need of caution in determining authorship by considerations of style and sentiment. Though no two men are exactly alike there is sometimes a resemblance near enough to mislead. May I indicate a further lesson? It surely must be well to keep personal feeling outside the sphere in which opinions are put forward and discussed. A Wagnerian and an anti-Wagnerian should be able to meet and say what is in them without flying at each other's throats. But musical controversy has never been free from the argumentum baculinum, or, at any rate, its verbal equivalent. All the same, we who enter into it do well to remember that personal abuse proves nothing.

A correspondent asks for particulars concerning the operatic competition set on foot by Mr. Charles Manners. These, I understand, will soon appear now that the judges are appointed. The MSS. sent in will be submitted to Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. Frederick Corder, and the present writer—a composer, a librettist, and a librettist-composer.

On the question of small fees for music lessons, my correspondents continue to supply me with illustrations of "than lowest depth a deeper still." A pianoforte teacher in Bristol gives two lessons weekly for 5s. per quarter, and in the same city, single lessons can be had at 3d. each. One lady gives three lessons a week for 7d. It is likely that the gentleman who (as per advertisement) has given himself to the Lord and teaches sacred music only, asks more on the strength of self-sacrifice.

A Melrose correspondent sends a number of advertisements from a paper published in Edinburgh. The following are a sample—

PIANOFORTE.—Lady has vacancies; terms, beginners, 10s. 6d. per quarter; advanced, 15s.; 2 lessons weekly.

PIANO.—Lady has vacancies; beginners, 7s. 6d. quarter; 2 hours weekly.

PIANOFORTE.—Lady has vacancies; terms, 10s. 6d. per quarter, at pupil's own residence.

PIANOFORTE.—Experienced lady has few vacancies; terms 6s. 6d. quarterly; 3 lessons weekly.

This is sad—sad for the poor ladies whom fierce competition reduces to such straits, and, no less, for the art through which they gain what I suppose must be called a "living."

The subjoined extracts from a paper read in the North of England may serve for the reader's amusement. To comment upon them would be to spoil their effect:—"On Dr. Richter taking the bâton in hand to sway the musical destinies of the evening he met with a hearty reception." "The martial song of the master-singers, pitched in C, abounds in many tuneful and harmonious runs in the higher cleffs; whilst the declaration of love, pitched in E, indicates great passion and pathos, and the refrain of the master-singers' apprentices in E flat abounds also in various staccato movements, the whole making up some very inspiriting, striking, and tuneful combinations." "The orchestra, under the magician-like wand and inspiration of Dr. Hans Richter, seemed as by an edict from Walhalla itself, the abode of the gods, commanded to give Northumbrians a perfect rendition of this story of Scandinavian mythology. In fact, the spirit and meaning of the famous 'Ride of the Walkyries,' as if by instinct, were caught up by the entranced audience, the old Norse blood stirred in their veins; and, as the inspiriting martial strains resounded through Olympia, and culminated in one concerted burst of Wagnerian music, they for some minutes applauded to the echo."

A correspondent writes: "On reading your Special Correspondent's report of the Birmingham Festival, I am sure all admirers of Berlioz will be grateful to the Committee for their endeavour to render the French master's Te Deum acceptable to the masses by providing eleven drummers, when only six are indicated in the score—i.e., one for the kettle-drums, one for the bass drum, and four for the side drums. Or is it to Dr. Richter, who in London is content with two harps to represent the six required by Wagner in the 'Ring,' that we ought to tend our thanks? Your correspondent suggests that the audience were 'confounded'; had the materialised spirit of Berlioz been present, I have no doubt that the unnecessary drummers would have been in the same condition."

The late Madame Alboni was as shrewd in business as she was successful in song. When the Indian Mutiny began, and everybody on the Continent believed that the sun of England had set, the great contralto quietly realised all her property, even, it is said, to some of her jewels, and invested the proceeds in the English Funds, which were then almost at panic figure. "John Bull," she said, "has not finished yet," and so it turned out, much to his admirer's advantage. In disposing of her property by will, the sensible lady bequeathed the bulk of it to the City of Paris for the benefit of deserving scholars in the public schools, a certain number of whom are, on reaching a specified age, presented with a savings bank book in which there is an entry of £10 to the holder's credit. In working this simple plan there can be no leakage, against which Alboni was very careful to guard.

The vicar of a certain church not a thousand miles from any point in the British Islands, lately wanting an organist, invited applications, and drew up a list of conditions. A correspondent has sent me the reverend gentleman's paper, and I have read it, not with astonishment, being past that, in such matters, but with something like anger. This minister of religion offers his organist and choir-master the sum of £2 a month, and is careful to add, "paid monthly," which, I suppose, carries with it a month's notice on either side. In return for this vast sum, the vicar's musical officer is expected to play three services on Sunday and one on Wednesday evening, when, also, the boys must have an hour's practice; on Friday, he must conduct a full choir practice, first giving the boys half-an-hour by themselves; and attendance is expected on the usual Feast Days. Further, no pupils may be taken to the church organ, nor may that instrument be used by the organist himself, save on Saturday afternoon, when, I suppose, the charwomen are cleaning up. Yet further, the organist may not introduce any new music. To this the vicar adds that the gentleman engaged must be a member of the Church of England, confirmed, and a communicant. This is considerate, because the unhappy individual will need all the consolation that religion can afford. But will any man accept such a post? I sincerely hope not. Such terms as this vicar offers are an insult to an honourable and educated profession. Let him play his organ himself.

The paragraph next above may appropriately be followed by the subjoined statement of fact. Said a clergyman to his organist: "I wish you wouldn't play quite so loud, Mr. ——, it is impossible to hear the voices. A mere touch is sufficient, but you will thump so." The poor man did not know the structural difference between an organ and a pianoforte.

The Carrodus family are known to be clever, but I lately read in a North London journal, with some surprise, that "the Bernard Carrodus String Quartet gave a magnificent piece of orchestration from Mendelssohn (Op. 12)."

Another, or, perhaps the same, hyperborean critic "hedged" beautifully on the question whether a certain song was major or minor. He said it was "pitched in a somewhat minor key."

The letters of several obliging correspondents must, owing to press of matter, stand over for the present. They will receive attention in the next issue. Joseph Bennett.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The fact that the Albert Hall should have proved too small to accommodate all who desired to listen to the performance of "Elijah," with which the season of the Royal Choral Society commenced on the 1st ult., proved, in the first place, the enduring popularity of Mendelssohn's latest and most dramatic oratorio, and, in the second, the confidence of the oratorio-loving public in the association over which Sir Joseph Barnby has for many years held beneficent sway. That confidence was certainly not misplaced on the present occasion, for the general performance, more especially with respect to the choir, was almost faultless. Mr. Santley, who made the part of the Prophet his own many years ago, sang and declaimed it almost as finely as ever—a splendid lesson, in fact, to younger singers. Miss Ella Russell and Mr. Edward Lloyd were in their best form, and words of encouragement may be bestowed on three young vocalists—Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Lucie Johnstone, and Madame Clara Poole.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt," on the 22nd ult., was, in respect of the choir, perhaps the finest ever given in the Albert Hall. Not only the precision with which every number was given, but the clear enunciation of the words was worthy of the most unqualified admiration. Purists have all along objected, and will probably continue to object to the rendering of the duet "The Lord is a Man of War" by four hundred tenors and basses, but the splendid effect produced by this perfectly-trained body of voices cannot be gainsaid. The "Hailstone" chorus was, of course, encored, and Mr. Lloyd, who surpassed himself on this occasion, was compelled to repeat "The enemy said." Miss Clara Butt was apparently suffering from nervousness at first, but recovered herself later in the evening. The efforts of Miss Anna Williams and Miss M. Hoare should receive acknowledgment.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

These Concerts have now reached their ninth season, and the success which has happily attended them of late seems to have suggested that a larger locale was necessary. They accordingly began, on the 1st ult., at Queen's Hall, before an audience which about half filled the room. Supply sometimes creates demand: let us hope it will be so with the extra seats made available by Mr. Henschel's removal from the South to the North end of Regent Street. It is only fair to mention that some of the empty seats may have been due to a counter-attraction at the Albert Hall, which was offered on the same evening. The programme put forward was a model of its kind. It was not too long; contained a due proportion of the well-known, comparatively unfamiliar, and absolutely new; and provided sufficiently for the element of relief. A Symphony, two Overtures, a Concerto, and a couple of songs: the Symphony, Brahms in D; the Overtures, Wagner's "Meistersinger" and Humperdinck's Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel"—a genial, tuneful, and admirably-scored work, which pleased so much that it was announced for repetition, "by desire," at the third Concert, on the 29th ult.; the Concerto, Tschaikowsky's in B flat, brilliantly played by Mr. F. Dawson; the songs, Clärchen's from Beethoven's "Egmont," sung delightfully by Mrs. Henschel.

The second Concert, on the 15th ult., was interesting for several reasons. The band consisted of Mr. Henschel's Scottish Orchestra, which had not previously been heard in London; we were promised a first hearing of Goldmark's "Sappho" Overture; and the new violinist, Mr. Achille Rivarde, who had made so favourable an impression last year, was to play two pieces. There were still empty seats, but not so many. The Scottish Orchestra (which is led by Mr. Maurice Sons) is a compact instrumental force that, individually and collectively, must be spoken of with respect. The trombones indeed, by wasteful and ridiculous excess of noise, caused much amusement and some irritation; but, otherwise, the tone-quality of the band generally, though not conspicuously rich or mellow, was remarkable for depth and brilliance. As regards attack, unity, clearness of detail, phrasing, and attention to nuances of speed and power, nothing could have been better (always, of course, excepting the trombones), and the performances all through the evening were in consequence quite exceptionally enjoyable. Mr. Henschel too seemed to trust his orchestra more than usual—he led rather than drove—and the gain to his hearers was quite remarkable. Goldmark's Overture was announced as given for the first time in England, but erroneously, for, as may be seen in another column, it was played, on the 14th ult., at Newcastle, by Mr. Henschel himself. The point may appear unimportant, but is not so historically, and at any rate supplies a bad precedent. The work shows a remarkable degree of inventive power and knowledge of effect; is orchestrated with consummate skill and a very full palette of colours; and is altogether one of the best imitations of good music we ever remember to have heard. But it is only an imitation. In spite of a "Sappho motive," a "Love motive," an "Anguish motive," a "Lyric Poetry" motive, and an "Apotheosis," Goldmark's "Sappho" appeals exclusively to ear and head—the heart is left untouched. Mr. Rivarde's performances of Saint-Saëns's Concerto (No. 3) and of Svendsen's "Romance" aroused a degree of enthusiasm that was perfectly justified. Alike in technique and sentiment (to quote Sir John Stainer's happy phrase) they were admirable, and showed that there is scarcely any position to which, in the fulness of time, this gifted and sensitive artist may not aspire. The Symphony on this occasion was Mendelssohn's in A minor, that wonderful record of his Scottish tour, which, perhaps, more than any other of the composer's instrumental works, establishes his right to the position from which—we are occasionally told—there are some who would fain dislodge him. The Scottish Orchestra played it con amore, as was to be expected. The Concert ended with the "Procession to Walhall," from the end of "Das Rheingold," of which we recollect nothing but the playing of the trombones. Poor Wagner! Mr. Whitney Mockridge in "Fanget an," from "Die Meistersinger," was overweighted.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

The first series of these Concerts, given under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl last season, having proved so successful, it was natural that a second should be announced. The first of these, given on the 6th ult., at Queen's Hall, was made historically interesting by the fact that it was conducted by Richard Wagner's son, Siegfried, who, on this occasion, first appeared before the English public in that capacity. The audience attracted was naturally very large, and it may be said, also, very critical. Much was naturally expected from a musician who is not only the son of Wagner, but also the grandson of Liszt—though, on both accounts, Herr Siegfried found himself surrounded by friendly faces, on many of which the hope of a success was plainly visible. The platform had been turned into something resembling a forest, and when the hero of the evening came forward one was reminded of the other Siegfried threading his way through the woods on his way to victory over a certain "Wurm." The triumph in this case was not so complete perhaps, since Herr Wagner's exploits on the occasion were not of the kind intended to snuff out anyone's career; but it none the less gave gratifying proofs that the young musician had inherited a considerable share of the sensitiveness, energy, power of will, and personal influence that were so conspicuous in his grandfather and father, and which also distinguish Madame Wagner at the present day. The programme contained Liszt's "Les Préludes" and "Mephisto" Waltz, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Flying Dutchman" Overture, the familiar "Tristan" selection, and the closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung." The readings of all these works were marked in a high degree by intelligence and sympathy, but also, we thought, by an exaggerated degree of refinement, that detracted somewhat from their breadth and virility. The "Siegfried Idyll" (which, it will be recollected, is a "tone-picture" of the young conductor's own childhood) was taken more slowly than we have been accustomed to hear it, and seemed long in consequence, which so beautiful a piece ought not to do. As regards appearance and manner, Herr Wagner's features show many of his father's characteristic traits; his gestures are eloquent, his beat very firm and well-defined, and, to quote what was said of another conductor, "he keeps his score in his head rather than his head in his score." It may be mentioned, as a minor detail, that he holds the bâton in his left hand. In a word, it is clear that Herr Siegfried Wagner possesses many of the qualifications of a great conductor. Experience will probably supply those that are now lacking. Miss Marie Brema gave a superb rendering of the terribly exacting music of Brünnhilde in the "Götterdämmerung" Finale; but the part lies so high that, if this fine artist values her voice, she will not often be induced to sing it.

The second Concert, on the 19th ult., was conducted by Herr Mottl. Besides three Wagner excerpts and the No. 3 "Leonora" Overture, it contained two novelties. The first of these, the Introduction to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," may be all very well in its right place, after the thematic material of which it consists has been associated in the listener's mind with dramatic events; but, heard in a concert-room without this advantage, it is anything but satisfactory. The style of the themes and of their treatment and orchestration echoes that of Wagner, but, of course, without a tithe of his genius. The second novelty, a Festival March by Herr August Wilhelmj, is an elaborate piece ambitiously scored, proving that one may be great as a violinist and leader without being equally so as a composer. The "Götterdämmerung" Finale was repeated by Miss Brema, and in the "Rheingold" Finale the vocal parts were most effectively sung by Miss Agnes Janson, Miss Evangeline Florence, and Madame Minna Fischer; Messrs. W. Ludwig (Wotan), E. Wareham (Loge and Froh), and Arthur Barlow (Donner). The third Concert took place too late for notice in our present issue.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

At the Concert of October 29 Tschaikowsky's noble "Pathetic" Symphony formed the chief feature of the programme, and met with a very fair measure of justice from the Sydenham Band, though the strings were at times somewhat lacking in power and incisiveness of attack. M. Ysaÿe gave a very clever reading of the solo in Max Bruch's D minor Concerto (No. 2), and scored a popular success in Wieniawski's showy "Faust" Fantasia. The Overture to "Euryanthe" was very finely played, and the programme also included Mr. MacCunn's beautiful "Land of the Mountain and the Flood" Overture, and songs from Mdlle. Otta Brony, who was heard to considerable advantage in the "Sombre forêt," from "William Tell."

At the Mendelssohn Concert, on the 3rd ult.—the anniversary of his death falling on the following day—there was an enormous audience, and no lack of enthusiasm. The programme opened with the immortal "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture, the exquisite beauty of which exerted all its wonted spell as interpreted with the utmost spirit by the orchestra, under Mr. Manns's sympathetic guidance. Admirable also was the performance of the "Scotch" Symphony, another favourite cheval de bataille of Mr. Manns. Miss Fanny Davies, the instrumental soloist of the afternoon, might have chosen something less hackneyed than the well-worn Concerto in G minor or the Prelude and Fugue in E minor; but her careful and conscientious rendering of both these works met with abundant favour from the audience. Miss Anna Williams gave the Concert aria "Infelice" with her wonted intelligence and earnestness, and sang the solo in the Finale to "Loreley," in which, as in the familiar part-song "Farewell to the Forest," the Crystal Palace Choir lent very useful aid. At the opening of the Concert the Dead March in "Saul" was played in memory of the late Czar, the Russian Hymn being added as a tribute of cordial goodwill to his son and successor.

For the Concert of the 10th ult. a "Meditation," by M. Massenet, had been promised, but owing to the non-arrival of the chorus parts the work was postponed and M. Saint-Saëns's Prelude to "The Deluge" was played in its stead. The Prelude is a curiously sentimental treatment of so momentous a theme, but is otherwise a pleasing composition, with an effective obbligato for the first violin, excellently played by Mr. Celis, the leader of the Crystal Palace Orchestra. Mr. Godfrey Pringle's "Lo Zingaro," a scena for baritone and orchestra, which was now heard for the first time, is a clever though rather showy piece of work, the treatment of the orchestra strongly recalling at times that of Iago's Credo in "Otello," and again, and even more strongly, the Prologue to "I Pagliacci." It has, however, a certain sparkle, though rather suggestive of tinsel than real gold; and thanks, in no small measure, to the vigorous declamation of Mr. Andrew Black, made a decidedly favourable impression on the audience. Beethoven's splendid "Weihe des Hauses" Overture and Walther's Prize Song, in which Mr. Whitney Mockridge's laboured and ineffective singing was rendered still more unimpressive by the undue vigour of the band, completed the first part of the programme. The second was devoted to Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," the beauties of which were again keenly appreciated. Mr. Andrew Black was thoroughly efficient and trustworthy as the bass Narrator, and Miss Ella Russell sang with adequate power and accuracy as the heroine; but Mr. Mockridge was palpably overweighted in the tenor solos. The choir sang well, on the whole, though a little roughness on their part and—strange to say—on that of the orchestra was occasionally apparent.

Mr. William Wallace, whose rather affectedly-named Overture, "In Praise of Scottis Poesie," was the novelty at the Concert of the 17th ult., has already had a Symphonic Poem and an Orchestral Prelude—the latter a work of undoubted cleverness—produced at these Concerts. The present work owes its origin to the request of some of his countrymen that he "would give them something Scotch," and it is an ingenious but hardly convincing answer. Mr. Wallace—and for this we like him none the less—has eschewed a programme. But the themes which he has coined are neither striking nor individual, with perhaps the exception of the second, which is afterwards developed into a long melody with some graceful orchestral embroidery. The work is not wanting in a certain brilliancy of a stereotyped order, and is cleverly scored; but it failed to impress the audience, who accorded it but a cool reception. Moszkowski's Concerto in C (Op. 30), first introduced in this country by M. Tivadar Nachèz at one of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts, in March, 1886, was finely played by M. Emile Sauret, who especially distinguished himself in the long-drawn Andante. The same artist also introduced an elegant and neatly scored "Elegie et Rondo" of his own composition. Brahms's "Academic" Overture, Schumann's Symphony in C—the latter very finely played—and two excerpts from Handel's Concertos completed the orchestral part of the programme. Miss Esther Palliser gave the recitative and aria, "O mon bien aimé," from Massenet's "Marie Magdeleine"—oratorio à la Renan, as it has been happily called—in excellent style. Her other selection, Hope Temple's "Airlie Bay," was most injudicious and unsuitable at a Concert of this character.

HAMISH MacCUNN'S "JEANIE DEANS."

(From our own Correspondent.)

The production of the first Scottish Opera, by a Scotsman, on a Scottish subject, and presented in the Northern capital, on the very ground which Scott has immortalised in the "Heart of Midlothian," may well be called an event of national importance. The Lyceum Theatre was crowded, on the 15th ult., to the very doors and ceiling, testifying to the general interest excited by the work; and the reception accorded to Mr. MacCunn as he took his place at the conductor's desk was evidence enough of high hopes and warm wishes on the part of the audience. Nor were these hopes disappointed; and the composer's warmest well-wisher could not have desired a franker acknowledgment of success than the ovation of applause at the conclusion of the opera. It is a pleasant part of our task, first, freely to acknowledge that "Jeanie Deans" is an opera which performs a great deal that is good and promises much more. Faults there are in the work doubtless, and shortcomings, which it is our duty to point out. Experience gained in the representations will show many parts capable of improvement, and many scenes which no doubt will be revised and altered before the opera is submitted for a final verdict; but the abiding impression left by the first performance is that we have a young countryman who can and will write a much more perfect and much more important work in a not distant future.

The Scottish flavour in the music is judiciously minute, being almost confined to the two national dance tunes introduced in the first scene; and the dialect is fortunately no more conspicuous. The "Heart of Midlothian" is, perhaps, Scott's most fascinating novel; but the simple story of Jeanie and Effie Deans, comparatively uninteresting in itself, was only the excuse, so to speak, for connecting the stirring scenes of history and the wonderful sketches of Scottish life and character which give the novel its high place in Scottish hearts. The omission of much that is inseparably connected with the well-known romance, and the obvious necessity of making all the characters forget the "Doric," have imposed on the librettist (Mr. Joseph Bennett) many limitations, which, however, he has concealed with great skill. David Deans is still the rigid Cameronian, although he talks as good English as any hated Episcopalian; and Jeanie has no less a leal Scottish heart because she has forgotten her mother tongue. The character of Staunton is, of course, hardly that of an ideal hero; but Mr. Bennett has endeavoured to impart interest by early indicating the remorse Staunton feels for his betrayal of Effie. Altogether Mr. Bennett has provided the composer with a libretto full of dramatic interest, and he was not overlooked by the audience when the time for congratulations and calls arrived, but although present he did not respond.

The best parts of the music are those which accompany or illustrate dramatic action. The orchestration is extremely clever and effective, but in many places Mr. MacCunn has left the wood-wind unaccountably idle where it would be a distinct acquisition. He has laid a "self-denying ordinance" on his powers of simple and expressive melody, and has striven to attain success along far more difficult lines. All the more do we prize the scenes where the artistic intention has given his melodic genius the rein. The recitative, or rather "melos," is at times rather unquiet and even ungainly in its harmonic progressions, but is for the most part very expressive and extremely well accompanied. Two opportunities have been palpably thrown away—viz., the Madrigal in the Court Scene and the Lullaby in the Prison—the one extremely crude in its part-writing and uninteresting in its musical content, and the other smothered under rhythmless melody in a labyrinth of dissonances. Opportunities which have been seized and turned to the best account are Dumbiedikes's song in the first scene ("I love a maiden fair to see"); the first meeting of Jeanie and her erring sister, a most touching scene; Madge Wildfire's songs in the second and in the last act ("I glance like the wildfire" and "There grows a tree"); Effie's pathetic recollection of home in the prison; Jeanie's appeal to the Queen for her sister's life; and the wild chorus of the reckless prisoners (Allegro feroce). The chorus remains almost unused throughout the opera, which cannot be regarded as a satisfactory arrangement.

Madame Duma found in Jeanie Deans a part which suits her to perfection. Her earnest style and conscientious study have succeeded in realizing the very ideal which librettist and composer must have had when they wrote and composed her part. Miss Estey was very successful as Effie, but the part is rather incomplete, as well as unattractive. Another lullaby song would help to leave a tenderer memory of one who "loved not wisely." Miss Meisslinger was in every way an excellent Madge Wildfire. Her commanding presence, a dress copied from a famous old engraving of Madge, and a thorough grasp of the individuality of the poor mad woman made her impersonation one of the successes of the evening. Mr. Alec Marsh looked and acted "douce David Deans" to the life, while Mr. Hedmondt acted and sang admirably, although he did not seem to feel quite at ease in the somewhat ungrateful character allotted to Staunton; he looked, however, the ideal of a heartless, selfish scapegrace. Mr. Pringle made a great deal of the rôle of Dumbiedikes, and well earned a large share of the applause.

The scenery and staging were very good indeed, and Mr. Friend must be congratulated on such a smooth and satisfactory first night.

The Marquis of Lorne, who is collaborating with Mr. MacCunn on a new opera—founded on the old Scottish legend of "Diarmid and Ghraidne"—was present at the première, and all the leading journals in the country were represented. The opera was repeated before as full a house on Saturday, the 17th ult., and on both occasions all Edinburgh, musical, literary, and social, was present to show its interest in the important event.

HOVINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The sixth of these unique miniature Festivals was held at Hovingham, on October 23 and 24. A programme, quite equal to its predecessors in interest and ambition, was prepared, and more than creditably performed under the artistic direction of Canon Hudson, who after his long experience in work of this kind may claim to be considered one of our ablest amateur conductors. At the first of the three Concerts of which the Festival consisted, Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" took up the greater part of the programme. The performance had the advantage of two exceptionally able principals in Miss Palliser and Mr. Andrew Black, who were well suited by their respective parts. Mr. Herbert Grover, as the Demon Lover, would have been more successful had he not apparently been under the impression that forcing his voice would render his impersonation more demoniacal. Considering the difficulty of the work, and the fact that the very limited time available for preparation made it impossible to have a full rehearsal, the performance was remarkably good, a few inconspicuous slips in chorus and orchestra being, under the circumstances, readily pardonable. The band, it should be added, was of a metal far superior to that of the average provincial orchestra. It is the reproach of Yorkshire, a county professedly musical, that Concert-givers cannot give orchestral performances of the first rank without having recourse to London or Manchester; so that Hovingham, being only a village of some 400 inhabitants, could not be held blameable for having to go far afield for its band, many of the players at the principal desks being well known in metropolitan orchestras. At the same Concert was heard the first of the two novelties of the Festival, a setting by Mr. E. W. Naylor, the Organist of St. Michael's, Chester Square, of a passage from Tennyson's "King Arthur," and intended as the prologue to a cantata bearing that name. A short choral introduction leads to a baritone solo, "The lament of the King," the music of which has a dignity quite in keeping with the noble words. The melody is broad and spontaneous, and the orchestral colour shows an unusual aptitude and understanding of what is the fitting treatment of each particular instrument. The solo was very sympathetically sung by Mr. Arthur Walenn, and the performance, under the composer's conductorship, was in all respects satisfactory. The programme also included Dr. Mackenzie's breezy and humorous "Britannia" Overture, which was played with admirable spirit, as was the ever fresh "Figaro" Overture. Mr. Leonard Borwick played solos by Bach, Scarlatti, and Chopin, all very finely; but Scarlatti supremely well. The second Concert, on the following afternoon, was of an equally interesting character. Dr. Parry's noble "St. Cecilia" Ode occupied the first half of the programme, and it was sung with admirable force and breadth, the solos being taken by Miss Palliser and Mr. Andrew Black most sympathetically. The performance was, indeed, the most conspicuous success of the Festival, and reflected the utmost credit on everyone who took part in it. There was a novelty in the shape of three movements from a Suite for strings by Mr. Emil Kreuz, a Scherzo, Intermezzo, and Courante, less notable, perhaps, for novelty of thematic material than for the exceedingly clever workmanship—a matter of the first importance in music of this character. As was to be expected, the music was well adapted to the instruments. It was well played and very heartily received. Mr. Borwick's artistic and thoughtful reading of Chopin's E minor Concerto was one of the most striking features of the Concert, and the careful playing of the accompaniments by the band deserves particular praise. Equally creditable was the refined rendering of the "Siegfried Idyll"—a piece the clear-cut, delicate lines of which make any deviation from perfect precision painfully noticeable. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" Scherzo only lacked something in lightness of treatment to be equally satisfactory. Such fairy-like music demands very dainty treatment. Mr. Herbert Grover sang the rather sugary Prayer from "Rienzi" forcibly. The Festival ended with "Elijah," in which the principal soloists were Miss Palliser, Mrs. Burrell, Messrs. Grover and Black. Mr. Black's fine performance of the title part is too well known to need description; it may suffice to add that it was quite worthy of his powers. In other respects the performance of the Oratorio was equal to the high standard of the Festival, to which it formed a fitting termination. A word must be given to Mrs. Burrell's unaffected and sympathetic singing of the contralto music, since this was the only occasion for the appearance of a contralto soloist during the Festival.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The annual Festival (the 156th) of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain, held in Westminster Abbey, on the evening of the 7th ult., proved specially attractive through the introduction to the metropolis of Professor Bridge's "The Cradle of Christ," which elicited such unanimous approval at the Hereford Festival. This novelty was preceded by "The Hymn of Praise," with Madame Albani, Mrs. Helen Trust, and Mr. Iver McKay to do justice to the solo portions; whilst the majestic choruses were given with much fervour by a large choir. An efficient orchestra, led by Mr. J. T. Carrodus, played the opening Symphony as well as the accompaniments in a highly satisfactory manner, under the bâton of Professor Bridge. Mr. W. J. Winter was at the organ. After the offertory, in aid of the Society, Madame Albani sang "Angels ever bright and fair," and then came Professor Bridge's setting of the "Stabat Mater Speciosa." A second hearing of this work increases the favourable opinion formed in September at the Three Choirs gathering. It has all the simplicity befitting the theme of the old Latin hymn; yet, whether in its vocal or instrumental elements, the interest is so well preserved that at the end one wishes the composer had extended his labours. The two characteristic solos were ably sung by Madame Albani and Mr. Daniel Price, and the rendering of the orchestration and of the choruses left nothing to be desired.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

A very successful commencement was made to the thirty-seventh season of these entertainments on Monday, October 29, at St. James's Hall, the audience being considerably above the average on the opening night. There was nothing in the programme to call for detailed notice, the concerted works being Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74) and Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 63), both universally acknowledged masterpieces. The leader was Miss Wietrowetz, who was more satisfactory in the Trio than the Quartet. The talented young Hungarian violinist gave a fine performance of Max Bruch's effective Romance in A minor and major (Op. 42), and Mr. Leonard Borwick rendered Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111) with much intelligence and perfect technique. Mrs. Helen Trust sang a couple of pleasing songs by Max Stange, and James Hook's quaint ditty, "Ma chère amie," with charming finish in respect of vocal method.

So much prominence was given to Mendelssohn's music in the programme of the first Saturday Concert on the 3rd ult., that it might be guessed by those present that Mr. Arthur Chappell desired to commemorate the anniversary of the composer's death, which occurred on the following day, though such an intention was not formally announced. The works performed were the Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1), the Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 66), and the Variations Sérieuses for pianoforte (Op. 54), the last-named being played with perfect refinement by Mr. Josef Slivinski, who added the Volkslied in A minor from the "Lieder ohne Worte" as an encore. Miss Dale sang with taste airs by Krug, Grieg, and Kjerulf, but her selections were too uniformly sombre.

On the following Monday there was a group of novelties, the most important being a Pianoforte Quintet in F by Mr. Moir Clark, a young Scottish musician who studied for some time at the Royal Academy of Music, and more recently in Germany. This Quintet was performed at one of Miss Dora Bright's Concerts last year, at a busy time, when it attracted little attention. It is noteworthy throughout for fresh and tuneful themes, but the workmanship is not very clear, and if it be true, as stated in the programme, that "the composer aimed to secure greater variety and strength of colour than chamber music usually presents," he essayed a hopeless task, for what is known as "colouring" appertains specially to orchestral music. The Quintet, however, was received with warmth, and Mr. Moir Clark may be encouraged to persevere. Miss Fanny Davies deserves commendation for introducing Chopin's Polonaise Fantaisie in A flat (Op. 61), an impressive and original piece, singularly neglected by pianists. Mr. Whitehouse, the violoncellist at this and the previous Concerts, played with the utmost refinement a tender little piece called "Waldesruhe," by Dvorák, and a piquant Allegro Appasionato by Saint-Saëns. Beethoven's early Quartet in D (Op. 18, No. 3) was included in the scheme, and Miss Margaret Hoare was agreeable in songs by Chaminade and Tiesen.

The second Saturday performance commenced with Haydn's Quartet in G minor (Op. 74, No. 3) and ended with Brahms's concise and genial Sonata in F for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 99). Miss Fanny Davies gave a very intelligent rendering of Schumann's Waldscenen (Op. 82), and Miss Wietrowetz played Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor (Op. 26), with pianoforte accompaniment. This was surely not a very wise selection, though, of course, it was not the artist's fault that the snapping of a string necessitated an interruption in the performance. Mrs. Helen Trust was again wholly praiseworthy as the vocalist.

On Monday, the 12th ult., the concerted works were Rubinstein's bright and melodious Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 52), delightfully played by Messrs. Slivinski, Arbos, and Hugo Becker, and Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1). Mr. Becker introduced the first four numbers of a Suite for violoncello with pianoforte accompaniment, entitled "Love Scenes," composed by himself. The movements are fancifully named, "First Sight," "Doubt," "Dreaming," and "Flirting," and are piquant and tuneful little pieces. They were beautifully played by the composer. Mr. Slivinski interpreted Schumann's "Papillons" with the requisite delicacy of touch, and Miss Esther Palliser sang with much effect airs by Pergolesi, A. Holmes, and Gounod.

Little more remains to be said respecting these entertainments at present. On Saturday, the 17th ult., that accomplished performer, Herr Popper, was the violoncellist; and besides taking part in Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) and Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2) for pianoforte and violin, played pieces by Schumann and himself with beautiful finish of style. Mr. Leonard Borwick was also very successful in Haydn's Variations in F minor, and Madame Amy Sherwin was fairly acceptable as the vocalist.

On the following Monday took place the last Concert we can notice this month, Lady Hallé making her first appearance this season. The gifted Moravian violinist was enthusiastically received, and played throughout with exquisite skill and grace. Her solos were Professor Stanford's delightful Irish pieces, "A Lament," "Hush Song," and "Reel"; and the concerted works in the programme were Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3)—perhaps the most popular of all string quartets—and Brahms's genial Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 101). Much favour was deservedly accorded to Miss Kate Cove—a young vocalist possessed of a silvery and sympathetic soprano voice, which has evidently undergone judicious training. Miss Cove was equally successful in Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Orpheus with his Lute" and Goring Thomas's "Winds in the Trees."

THURSDAY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.

In the Queen's (Small) Hall a new series of these Concerts was commenced on the 1st ult. As on preceding occasions the plan is to devote the whole of the first part to a distinguished composer, whilst miscellaneous songs and instrumental solos form the material for the remainder of the programme. The present season was started with a selection from the works of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. Among these were the Quartet in E flat (Op. 11) for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, which received conscientious interpretation from Messrs. Septimus Webbe, Otto Peiniger, Emil Kreuz, and Hans A. Brousil; and the lovely Benedictus (Op. 37, No. 3), played with adequate expression by Mr. Peiniger. Mr. William Nicholl (who did so much to establish these Concerts) gave some songs with his usual charm of voice and style, and further vocal assistance was contributed by Miss Esther Palliser and Mr. Arthur Oswald.

Franz Schubert was the master favoured at the second Concert, on the 15th ult. None of his chamber pieces could have proved more acceptable than the melodious Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 99), as rendered by Messrs. Webbe, Peiniger, and Brousil; and warm approval was accorded to the first-named for his delivery of the Impromptu in F minor (Op. 142, No. 1). It would have been difficult, too, to make a better choice of songs than "Clärchen's Lied," "Schäfer's Klagelied," and "Lachen und Weinen," entrusted to the safe charge of Miss Louise Phillips; "Der Tod und das Mädchen" and "Haiden Roslein," tastefully given by Miss Helen Pettican; and "Du bist die Ruh'" and "Die Post," rendered with the utmost judgment and with rare expression by Mr. Nicholl, one of the few artists who can do justice to songs calling for intelligence as well as vocal means.

MR. KIVER'S CONCERT.

The Concerts given by this rising and conscientious artist are not only invariably distinguished by high-class programmes, but they rarely fail to contain some feature of more than usual interest to musicians. Thus, on October 31, Mr. Kiver first brought to public hearing, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, a new Sonata for pianoforte and violin by Miss Rosalind Ellicott, and three pieces from a recently published set for the same combination of instruments by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. Miss Ellicott's work, which is in three movements, is clearly designed, abounding in melody, not, perhaps, of a very original type, but graceful, flowing, and free from attempts to "make points" by undue straining after effect. The composer was called upon to acknowledge the applause evoked, some portion of which, no doubt, was meant for the executants, M. Emile Sauret and the concert-giver. Dr. Mackenzie's pieces are entitled "From the North," and are chiefly based upon very old airs and dances, which are "either of undoubted Scottish origin or have been in use in Scotland at a remote period." The three performed on this occasion comprise the first of three "books," and consist of an Andante, of which the chief theme, somewhat like a dirge and full of pathos, alternates with more passionate phrases; a graceful Andantino, tuneful, quaint, and altogether charming; and an Allegretto Giocoso, brimming over with fun, which pleased so much that its repetition was demanded. The pieces were played with delightful spirit and expression by M. Emile Sauret and their composer. Mr. Kiver chose as his solo Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," of which he gave a sound and refined, but not very romantic reading; and Miss Hilda Wilson sang four songs with customary taste. In the second part of the programme were Grieg's Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violoncello and G. A. Macfarren's Trio in E, the bass instrument in both works being in the safe hands of Mr. W. E. Whitehouse.

BRITISH CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS.

Mr. Ernest Fowles has successfully launched the excellent enterprise the title of which heads this notice. His first Concert was given on October 29, his second on the 13th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, and his third was announced for the 27th ult. The works at the first Concert included Professor Stanford's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 45), the Duet in E minor for two pianofortes by Dr. Parry, Mr. Algernon Ashton's Quintet in E minor (No. 2) for pianoforte and strings, and songs and pianoforte pieces by Cowen, M. V. White, Goring Thomas, Leveridge, Parry, and Arthur O'Leary. These were interpreted by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. J. and W. Sutcliffe, A. Hobday, W. Squire, and Ernest Fowles; Mr. Alfred Izard being the accompanist. At the second Concert (13th ult.) were heard a Trio in E (Op. 9) for pianoforte and strings, by Mr. J. C. Ames; a Sonata for pianoforte and viola (Op. 1), by Mr. L. N. Fowles; a Quintet for pianoforte and strings in F (Op. 33), by Mr. B. L. Selby; and songs by Mackenzie and Goring Thomas, and Samuel Wesley's Trio in D for three pianofortes. Mrs. Mary Davies was the vocalist, and Miss Emily Shinner, Messrs. E., L., and B. Fowles, Whitehouse, E. Kiver, and G. W. Collins took charge of the instrumental portion of the programme, the accompanist on this occasion being Mr. H. Bird.

MR. PLUNKET GREENE AND MR. LEONARD BORWICK'S RECITALS.

The talents of these admirable artists are happily so well known that it is quite unnecessary to waste words in praise of the happy thought which led to their organisation of a series of Concerts à deux—a combination which, tried already with perfect success last season in London, and since in the provinces, was again presented on the 16th ult., at St. James's Hall. The sum of each artist's attractive power is more than doubled by this alliance; it is increased also by the effect derivable from contrast and the charm of variety. Add to this a programme which had been selected with due regard for the stimulation of interest, and it will be seen that an exceptionally enjoyable entertainment was set before the large audience assembled on the occasion in question. The selection of songs included, besides a number of more or less well-known ones by Schumann, Schubert, Wagner, &c., examples composed in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries—i.e., two very expressive old German Minnelieder (one from the Locheimer Song Book, 1460), Rontani's quaint "Se bel rio" (1590), and Buononcini's "Ben chè Speranza," and six of Moore's "Old Irish Melodies," as restored by Professor Stanford to their ancient forms. The complete series is shortly to be published, and we may therefore fitly defer discussion of the points of difference between Moore's and the original versions of these beautiful songs. Mr. Greene was accompanied by Dr. Stanford in the Irish melodies, and by Mr. Borwick in the foreign pieces. The pianoforte solos consisted of Schumann's "Humoresque," Bach's Organ Prelude in B minor, and pieces by Chopin, Scarlatti, and Liszt. At the second Recital, on the 14th inst., Mr. Greene will sing songs composed in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and seven excerpts from Miss Broadwood and Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland's "Songs of the English Counties"; and Mr. Borwick will play, amongst a number of other things, Purcell's Toccata in A and Mozart's Sonata in D.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The London musical season is yet young, but already pianists are bidding freely for patronage. Mr. Dal Young, who gave a Recital in the Queen's (Small) Hall on Tuesday, October 30, did not make, on the whole, a very favourable impression. He has nimble fingers, but his touch is hard and his style jerky and affected. The defects were chiefly noticeable in Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), with the "Funeral March." In some pieces by Chopin, Mr. Dal Young was rather more commendable, and some "Fantasiettes Lyriques" from his own pen proved tasteful and pleasing little pieces.

The announcement that Mr. Emil Sauer, a pianist utterly unknown in this country, would give eight Pianoforte Recitals within a few weeks at St. James's Hall, was no doubt surprising to musical amateurs; but after the first Recital, on the 13th ult., it was felt that the latest aspirant to honours in this form of art had not overmeasured his strength. Mr. Sauer commenced with a transcription of a Prelude and Fugue in D by Bach, arranged by D'Albert, and followed it by Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata. In both of these he displayed striking executive powers and a style that may fairly be described as leonine; but it was when he attacked the music of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt that his strength was fully displayed. The gradations of tone were exquisite, and the touch and tone, alike in pianissimo and fortissimo passages, effective in the highest degree. The audience, somewhat cold and reserved at first, worked itself into a more and more excited condition, and the Recital was considerably lengthened by recalls and encores.

It was poor Rubinstein who was Josef Hofmann's last preceptor, and it was perhaps as well that the young pianist gave his only Recital this season at St. James's Hall a few hours before the news was flashed that the great artist, virtuoso, and composer was no more. Happily, Mr. Hofmann was able to give his performance, on the 19th ult., without any apprehension of the calamity so close at hand. He played three of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," Weber's beautiful but rarely-heard Sonata in D, pieces by Chopin, Liszt, Rubinstein, and Moszkowski—the last being clever and effective, written with evident design in the old style—with the utmost intelligence and technical skill; and some trifles from his own pen served to indicate that his powers as a composer are increasing.

Mr. Emil Sauer is already making his way with the public, a large audience attending his second Recital, on the 21st ult. He commenced with Beethoven's cheery Sonata in G (Op. 31, No. 1), playing the beautiful slow movement with exquisite taste. His magnificent technique, however, was most fully displayed in Schumann's Toccata in C (Op. 7), Chopin's Allegro de Concert in A (Op. 46), Rubinstein's Staccato Study, and Liszt's "Norma" Fantasie, which had not been heard here for many years. The audience was enthusiastic throughout, and the reputation of Mr. Emil Sauer in this country may be said to be already established.

MRS. KATHARINE FISK'S RECITAL.

Much interest attached to Mrs. Katharine Fisk's Vocal Recital, on the 8th ult., at the Salle Erard; for in addition to an admirable selection from the writings of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Goring Thomas, and Leoncavallo, her programme included a number of songs by American composers, which, although in several instances proving little worthy of the fair singer's remarkable abilities, gave to the afternoon a pleasant element of expectancy. From this it will be gathered that Mrs. Fisk was heard to the greatest advantage in works of recognised value, and to these the gifted vocalist's magnificent voice and cultured and dramatic style imparted a charm and impressiveness that frequently aroused the enthusiastic plaudits of her audience.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, in his concluding Lecture on the progress of Music from the time of Ambrose to the period of the Renaissance, chiefly dealt with the early school of vocal composition. After referring to the absence of individuality in early instrumental music and to the origin and development of the motet and madrigal by Flemish, Italian, and English composers, the lecturer made an extremely interesting comparison between the life and works of Orlando di Lassus and Palestrina. The latter, like Schubert, seemed to have written because he could not help it, and it was to his simple piety and unwavering love of his church and his art that we owed his monumental works, now, more than ever, accounted among the wonders of the world of music. His powers had, indeed, quite overshadowed the fame of his great contemporary Lassus, although the genius of the latter was undoubtedly more many-sided, for his compositions included sentimental and even comic songs, as well as church and secular music. Lassus also deserved some of the credit of endeavouring to reform church music, entirely attributed by most writers on the subject to Palestrina. Lassus made, too, some experiments in instrumental music, in one instance scoring for eight trombones and four bagpipes, which, the lecturer humorously remarked, "although appearing very weak on paper, must have been very robust when delivered in sound." Referring to the quality of vocal music at that period, Dr. Mackenzie said that when discussing this point with Dr. Richter at the recent Birmingham Festival, the celebrated conductor narrated an anecdote he had heard from Wagner respecting the tradition of Bach's own manner of performance of his music. Wagner was a pupil of Weinlich (a successor of Bach's in Leipzig, and great grandson of a member of Bach's choir), and, according to him, when the Bach choirman was asked how the music sounded when performed under Bach's own direction, the answer was: "Why he (Bach) cuffed us a good deal, and it sounded horribly bad." An interesting analysis was given of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater" for two choirs, and the arrangement of this work by Wagner, as performed at the recent Birmingham Festival, referred to in eulogistic terms. The lecturer concluded by repeating the valuable advice, given to students at the commencement of the discourses, concerning the great importance of a thorough knowledge of the elements of music and the assiduous cultivation of the "hearing eye," without which they could not be truly called musicians. During the Lecture excerpts from Palestrina's "Missa Brevis" were excellently sung by some of the students of the Academy.

Mr. W. H. Cummings began a series of Lectures on October 31, the first two of which were devoted to early English music. The lecturer said we were chiefly dependent for the history of music in this country upon Sir John Hawkins and Dr. Burney, neither of whom did us justice. The former was not properly equipped for the work, and the latter, although fully qualified, was, in common with his contemporaries, prejudiced in favour of continental composers and inclined to regard English music in the spirit of Shakespeare's line, "'Tis an ill-favoured thing, but mine own." The false impression thus created seemed to have been deepened rather than erased by time, and even in a recent musical history by Riemann it was stated that "famous composers have always been sparsely sown in England." The truth was, however, that long before the Italian church modes were introduced here there existed in England a national School of Music, based upon our diatonic scale, which was not equalled in beauty and expressiveness by Continental writers for many centuries later. There were many reasons why only one specimen of our early national music at present existed. No musical notation had at that period been invented, and at a later date all documentary evidence was preserved to us by the clergy, who seemed always to have looked upon the music of the people as inimical to the common welfare. The one specimen of our early music that had been handed down to us—viz., "Sumer is i' cumen in," was written down by John Fornsete certainly not later than 1228, and, together with references by ancient writers, indubitably pointed to a high standard of musical expression having been attained in this country centuries earlier. The lecturer exhibited a set of ancient Northumbrian bagpipes, the compass and key of which were exactly suited to the performance of "Sumer is i' cumen in," and by quotations from old writers ably supported his contention that the early native music of Britain, in pure melody and euphonious harmony, had no equal or rival in any European country.

Great interest was imparted to the second Lecture by Mr. Cummings reading from a small volume which he had recently acquired, containing a series of letters written and received by the secretary of a society called the Royal Academy of Music with reference to a Motet called "La Vita Caduca," stolen by Buononcini, Handel's rival, from the Italian composer, Antonio Lotti. The society referred to had been founded for the purpose of performing madrigals and music of merit, and at one of its meetings Buononcini had had performed as his own the Motet in question. Some three years later, however, one of the members declared the Motet to have been composed by Lotti. This led to a correspondence between the society and Lotti, who proved by the sworn testimony of living witnesses that he had written the piece some twenty-six years before. The matter was deemed of such importance that the letters were printed; but until a few weeks ago the lecturer had been unable to obtain a copy of them. They throw many interesting side-lights on several musical matters of the time, amongst which may be mentioned that the society in question employed about forty vocalists and the same number of instrumentalists at their performances. Buononcini seemed to have been unable to refute the allegations, and as a consequence lost caste in English society, and there would seem to be little doubt that this affair conduced to his ultimately leaving England.

Episodes in the life of Beethoven formed the subject of the third Lecture, in which Mr. Cummings referred to the recent discovery of the programme of the first Concert at which Beethoven appeared. This was given in Bonn in 1778 by his father, who announced Beethoven as being only six years of age. As a matter of fact he was eight, as shown by the baptismal certificate; but this programme explained why Beethoven subsequently gave his age two years younger than he was. The interest of the lecturer's remarks was greatly enhanced by the exhibition of autograph scores and letters of the great master, amongst them being a remarkably well preserved and clearly written autograph score of the Trio in E flat (Op. 3), dated 1796, and several leaves from the composer's sketch-books.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A very excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Octet for strings opened the Students' Concert on the afternoon of the 1st ult. Miss Jessie Grimson, who led, played with equal intelligence and executive skill, a few trifling flaws in intonation in some of the most exacting parts hardly counting as a drawback to the general excellence of her performance; while her seven coadjutors joined in producing an ensemble that deserved the warmest praise. The other important feature of the programme, Beethoven's Quintet in C, unavoidably suffered a little from being placed last; the consciousness that some of your audience are leaving and the rest anxious to leave must disturb even experienced players. Nevertheless, the performance was entirely creditable to Miss Ruth Howell and her companions. Miss Mary Healey played with more facility than feeling Grieg's Ballade for pianoforte solo, and Miss Helen Jackson executed with much taste and skill the difficult florid passages of Handel's air "Sweet Bird," to the very skilful accompaniment of Mr. D. S. Wood, who promises to become an accomplished flute player.

The Choral and Orchestral Concert of the 14th ult. opened with Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and a striking performance of this fine work was given. The intricacies of the difficult score were brought out with remarkable clearness, and yet vigour, brilliancy, and dramatic intensity were not allowed to be sacrificed for this attention to detail. Schumann's D minor Symphony received an equally good rendering. Professor Stanford played it without break, in accordance with the composer's direction: "In einem Satze." Needless to say that the splendour of the work was thereby even enhanced, and that the violins gained in power through all the players standing during the performance. Mr. E. Dubrucq, who was the soloist in an Adagio and Rondo Hongroise for bassoon and orchestra by Weber, is already a very able player, and he evidently appreciates the peculiar genius of his instrument, the "clown of the orchestra." Mr. Emlyn Davies displayed a good voice and style in Haydn's "From out the fold" ("The Seasons"), and the programme was completed by a novelty by an ex-scholar,

Mr. S. P. Waddington. This was a setting, for chorus and orchestra, of a selection from Cowper's "John Gilpin." The famous poem may, perhaps, not "yearn for musical expression," but nevertheless the young composer has produced an enjoyable and clever little work. There is a healthy English ring about the music, and especially the spirited, catchy opening phrase; while the dash and vigour of the portions describing the ride cannot fail to appeal to an audience—the more so as our composer, like his hero, "has a pleasant wit and loves a timely joke," especially in the orchestra. The latter is treated throughout with much skill; it is, in fact, in the accompaniments that Mr. Waddington displays his gifts to the best advantage, his careful development of his thematic material being decidedly happy. The performance, conducted by the composer, was fairly good; there was certainly plenty of spirit, and, perhaps, too much of that generally desirable quality. The sopranos, at any rate, sang like so many famous prime donne in concerted music.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

There was quite an imposing function in the venerable City Guildhall, on October 27, when the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs attended in state to present a number of prizes to students in the prosperous school on the Victoria Embankment. The ceremony was preceded by a Concert, in which the choir was heard to much advantage in Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and the unaccompanied evening hymn, "O gladsome light," from "The Golden Legend"; and Miss Regina Atwater (soprano), Miss Florence Oliver (contralto), Master Percy Frostick (violinist), and Miss Madeline Payne (pianist) displayed more than average promise. Addresses were subsequently delivered by the Principal (Sir Joseph Barnby), who conducted the Concert; Mr. A. A. Wood (Chairman of the Music Committee of the Corporation), and the Lord Mayor, in which the valuable work carried on by the school was freely acknowledged, though it was urged that more attention might be given by pupils to sight-reading and to orchestral playing. It would occupy too much space to give a complete list of the prize winners, but among the most valuable of the awards were the Sir Augustus Harris Steinway grand pianoforte to Miss Augusta Foster; the Messrs. W. E. Hill and Son's violin of the value of £30 to Mr. Waldo Warner; and the Erard centenary scholarship of £40 per annum for three years, together with use of grand pianoforte and commemorative gold medal, to Miss Madeline Payne.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

Professor Bridge delivered his autumn series of Gresham Lectures, from the 13th to the 17th ult., at the City of London School, the fine hall of which was well filled on each occasion. The first Lecture, on "Palestrina," was of exceptional interest, revealing many facts contradictory to commonly accepted views regarding this composer. According to the recent researches of Francis Xavier Haberl, of Ratisbon, Palestrina's parents, far from being poor as hitherto believed, were people of some means. It is recorded that in 1540 they sold a "small chestnut wood," and in the next year a house; and that in 1547 their son, Palestrina, married a "wealthy citizen's daughter," and that her father dying shortly afterwards she inherited a considerable fortune, comprising cash, houses, clothes, fields and vineyards. Palestrina's father's name was Sante Pierluigi, and that of his mother, Maria Gismondi, and it would seem probable that they paid for his musical education under Goudimel, who had a music school in Rome at that period. If he did not receive instruction from Goudimel, he found some other very distinguished masters, such as Arcadelt, Festa, and Morales. Whoever taught him, Palestrina's progress at the school would seem to have been rapid, for in 1544—i.e., seven years before the date that histories have told us he began his true professional life as master of the music in the Cappella Giulia of the Vatican—we find that the Canons of St. Agapeto, in Palistrina, requested the services of their townsman as organist, and that on October 28, 1544, he signed the contract appointing him organist and choirmaster of the Cathedral at Palistrina "for the rest of his life." Palestrina was called to Rome by the following circumstances: On the death of Paul III., Cardinal del Monte was made Pope, as Julian III. This Cardinal had been Bishop of Palistrina from 1543 to 1550—i.e., during the whole period of Palestrina's organistship; and apparently was so impressed with the young organist's musical abilities that he caused the contract above mentioned to be rescinded, and made Palestrina Maëstro di Cappella. Not long after this Palestrina published his first work—viz., Four Masses, which acquire special interest from the fact that they were the first music by a native born Italian dedicated to a Pope. Doubtless in recognition of this dedication, Pope Julian conferred on Palestrina the exceptional honour of making him one of the singers in the Pope's private chapel, a position for which he was doubly disqualified by being a layman and married. On the advent of Pope Paul IV. he was deprived of this position, but allowed to retain his pension, and was subsequently appointed chapel-master at the Lateran. These facts dispose of the stories hitherto current of Palestrina having been born of humble parents, and, owing to poverty, having sung in the streets of Rome, &c. Palestrina's right to be called the saviour of church music is also impugned, by the discovery of a document dated Trent, August 1, 1551, in the form of a memorandum written by one Jean de Arye, a Spanish priest, which seems to show that Marcillius had resolved to attempt some reform of church music in the direction of restoring the plain chant to its proper position. Marcillius succeeded to the Papacy in 1555, but died too soon afterwards to carry his purposes into effect. Referring to this, M. Super, who quotes the above document, says: "To Palestrina belongs the responsibility of the intrusion of profane art in the Temple. In Marcillius we see the last representative of Gregorian traditions, which, after his date, was overrun by and spoilt by the dilettantism of the church and the theatre." If Palestrina was guilty of such practices, he probably erred from zeal to his art, and he made ample amends in his later works. How deeply he felt his responsibilities is, perhaps, best shown in his own words, with which Professor Bridge appropriately concluded his Lecture: "Music exerts a great influence upon the minds of mankind, and it is intended not only to cheer them, but to guide and control them. The sharper blame, therefore, do those deserve who misemploy so great and splendid a gift of God in light or unworthy things, and thereby excite men to sin and misdoing. As regards myself, I have from my youth been affrighted at such music, and anxiously have I avoided giving forth anything which could lead anyone to become more wicked or godless. During the Lecture a comprehensive selection of Palestrina's music, from sacred and secular writings, was admirably interpreted by Messrs. Bell, Ackerman, Branscombe, and Fell, and choristers from Westminster Abbey.

The second and third Lectures were devoted to the development of the String Quartet, from Bach and Handel to Haydn, the instructive series of illustrations comprising interesting excerpts from these masters, and also from the chamber music of G. B. Buononcini, N. Porpora, C. P. E. Bach, Gluck, P. Nardini, and C. F. Abel. The most curious of these was a Trio, published in 1751 by C. P. E. Bach. The title-page announces that it represents a friendly contest between Melancholius, a somewhat desponding gentleman, represented by the second violin muted; and Sanguineus, a person of cheerful disposition, represented by the first violin, not muted; while the violoncello takes the part of an impartial friend who, in the endeavour to accommodate both, does not always suit either very well. The Trio opens with a long first movement, chiefly consisting of conversational passages between the two violins, quasi-recitative, much of which is very humorous. This is followed by a slow movement, in which the argument is continued, with the result that Melancholius is ultimately persuaded to discard the mute and join Sanguineus in a lively Finale. The excerpts at these discourses were excellently played by Miss L. M. Wright, and Messrs. Hopkinson, Hobday, and Werge, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Borland.

At the concluding Lecture the Professor broke fresh ground, and, for the first time, took for his subject "Early Organ Music," the illustrations being skilfully played by Mr. G. W. Alcock on the organ in the North gallery of the hall. After a brief description of the organ in embryo, and amusing references to entries of expenses for carrying organs from one church to another, the Professor said that Tallis was the first lay organist we heard of. The earliest illustrations showed the influence of vocal writing, and the first departure towards instrumental individuality seemed to have been in the direction of florid ornamentation. This was pursued until an extraordinary development was attained, an example of which, in the shape of an organ part to Tallis's Service, gave much amusement to the lecturer's audience. The most interesting performance, however, was that of a Voluntary for "double organ," by Purcell. This displayed an acquaintance and sympathy with the genius of the organ only equalled by Bach, who probably was not born when it was written. That so effective an organ piece by our great English composer should have slumbered till now on the shelves of the British Museum would suggest a somnolent condition on the part of the Royal College of Organists.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The coming of age of the Musical Association, on the 13th ult., when it entered upon its twenty-first season, was marked by several innovations that promise to conduce to the future well-being of the Society. The meetings are in future to be held in the fine suite of rooms belonging to the Royal College of Organists, will take place at 5 p.m. on the second Tuesday of the month, and, in order to impart a more social character to the proceedings, will be preceded by "tea and coffee." That these new arrangements are acceptable to the majority of the members and their friends would seem to be indicated by the fact that the first meeting under these conditions was very largely attended.

No one could have been found to more appropriately preside on this occasion than Sir John Stainer, for it was he who first conceived the idea of the Society. Sir John, in a brief address, mentioned some of the most important papers which the Association had called forth, and showed that its printed volumes of Proceedings were a valuable contribution to the literature of musical art.

The paper read on this occasion was contributed by Mr. F. G. Edwards, who chose as his subject Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas, a theme singularly appropriate for the first meeting of the Association at the College of Organists. Mr. Edwards remarks had, however, nothing to do with the musical construction of the sonatas, but were confined to the circumstances which called forth and were intimately associated with their production. These historical details were invested with great interest, owing to the lecturer having had access to the original letters which passed between Mendelssohn and Mr. Coventry, of the publishing firm of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, and by the performance of several unpublished pieces which Mendelssohn had written for the series, but had afterwards omitted. The letters revealed the fact that Mendelssohn was desirous that his organ pieces should be simply called Sonatas in preference to being entitled "Voluntaries," and also termed "Mendelssohn's School for Organists." In a letter to Mr. Coventry, dated May 26, 1845, Mendelssohn characteristically writes: "Pray if you place it into the engraver's hands let him be most careful, in order to get a correct edition. . . . Perhaps some one of my English friends and brother organ players would look over them for me, besides the usual corrections of the proofs. Perhaps Mr. Gauntlett would do this." The original proof copy showed, however, that Mr. Vincent Novello, and not Dr. Gauntlett, acted as reviser. The unpublished pieces are most interesting, one in particular being a charming example of Mendelssohn's organ writing. Mr. Edwards's researches also enabled him to reveal many instructive alterations made in various passages during the composition of the sonatas, and to quote some remarkable contemporary criticisms. Amongst the latter was the following extract from a criticism of a column and a half by Dr. Gauntlett which appeared in the Morning Chronicle: "The epoch for expansion and extended analysis has passed away; the novelties of knotty points and subtle analogies are undesired; we want strong emotion, but it must be concentrated—it must strike sudden as the electric fluid—it must draw blood. And this is Mendelssohn." Even the most realistic productions of "young Italy" have scarcely elicited such criticism as this! Mr. Edwards's paper will be a valuable addition to the annual volume of the Association.

MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

The annual Banquet of the Musicians' Company was held at the Albion Tavern on October 30, Mr. J. C. Collard, the Master, in the chair. In proposing the toast of the "Worshipful Company of Musicians," the Master announced that on the recommendation of Sir George Grove, Sir Walter Parratt, and Professor Bridge, the gold medal of the Company would be bestowed on Miss Clara Butt. Professor Bridge read a letter of thanks from Miss Butt, who was then in Paris, for the honour conferred on her. "The Musical Educational Institutions of England" was proposed by Sir John Stainer. He said that the promise of future usefulness hoped for on the foundation of the Royal College was now being fulfilled; both there and at the Royal Academy we were turning out most excellent players, teachers, and composers, and we could cherish the hope that now we might go farther and produce an English Beethoven or Mendelssohn. Sir John dwelt on the importance of music as a valuable factor in the general scheme of education, bearing witness to the useful work carried on at the Kneller Hall School of Military Music, and at the great public schools of the country, where music was now finding its rightful position. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie expressed his thanks for the readiness with which the outside world recognised the work going on at the Royal Academy. He stated that he had been spending his holiday in France, and, indeed, hoped that Miss Butt would assist in dispelling the deplorable ignorance which still existed in that country respecting English music, an idea now abandoned in Germany and Italy. He said he would like to propose the health of Mr. Ben Davies, for the good work he had done for English music by his singing in Germany. Dr. Mackenzie said he had asked if there were any choirs in France who would sing our music by English composers, any theatres where our works could be played, or any French journals of music that cared to chronicle what went on in music in England, but he got no response. The ignorance of the French in this respect was truly astounding. However, as was pointed out in a recent comment in these pages, Wagner had only just been discovered in Paris, and Verdi's "Otello" had but recently been given, although the opera had been heard for years elsewhere. Dr. Mackenzie was warmly applauded on sitting down. The Worshipful Master was proposed by Mr. Wilkinson, and the Wardens by Professor Bridge. The music was provided by the pupils of the Royal College, Miss Jessie Grimson playing violin pieces by Saint-Saëns and Brahms-Joachim; Miss Clementine Pierpoint, Miss Kirkby Lunn, and Mr. Winsloe Hall sang songs, and Miss A. Walter played some pianoforte pieces. Mr. H. Hadley accompanied. The performance by these students was altogether so excellent as to create a wish that it might have been possible to present a medal not only to Miss Butt, but to each of the executants.

The music libraries of the late Dr. W. J. Westbrook, Dr. W. H. Monk, and Mr. J. H. B. Dando were recently offered for sale by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson. Among other works interesting to musicians were included: Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," interleaved with portraits of musicians, four volumes, £10 10s.; Sir John Hawkins's "History of Music"—W. Horsley's copy from Dr. Calcott's library—with manuscript notes by Dr. Burney, £3 15s.; Beethoven's "Werke," sixteen volumes, £4 2s. 6d.; Bach Society publications, 1851-85, £7 5s.; S. Simpson's "The Division Viol" (2nd edition), with portraits, 1667, £6 5s.; "A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke," by T. Morley, 1608, £6 10s.; C. Burney's "History of Music," portraits by Bartolozzi, £4; a manuscript of compositions by Dr. John Blow, Henry Purcell, Dr. Gibbons, and P. Hart, £3.

REVIEWS.

Transcriptions from the Works of Mendelssohn, for the Organ. By George Calkin. Books 7 and 8. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Few, if any, composers of the first rank have proved so serviceable to musicians who make organ arrangements and to performers on the instrument, as Mendelssohn, and his works have been nearly used up for this purpose. Mr. Calkin, however, has managed to break some fresh ground, so far as our knowledge extends. In Book 7 of his series there are arrangements of the Adagio from the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the Musical Sketch (No. 1), and a selection from the Variations Sérieuses. In Book 8 we have the second movement of the "Italian" Symphony, the Intermezzo from the Quintet in B flat (Op. 18), the Adagio from the Quartet (Op. 13), and the Andante from the Quartet (Op. 12). It may be noted that the editor does not give directions for registering, this matter being left to the discretion of the performer, and as the composer's marks of expression are, of course, inserted, organists of taste should be able to supply the rest.

Ten Years of University Music in Oxford. Compiled by P. C. Buck, B.A., B.Mus., Worcester College; J. H. Mee, M.A., D.Mus., Merton College; F. C. Woods, M.A., B.Mus., Exeter College. [Oxford: W. R. Bowden.]

This volume is a brief record of the proceedings of the Oxford University Musical Union from 1884 to the present time. It is a record of remarkable success, and one of considerable interest owing to the great beneficial influence the Union has exerted in the highest interests of musical art. According to the preface, "the idea of establishing a University Club for the study and practice of chamber music by members of the University of Oxford was 'in the air' all through the first two terms of the year 1884"; but to Mr. Franklin Harvey, Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, Mr. H. M. Abel, and the Rev. J. H. Mee belongs the honour of having held the first meeting to consider the possibility of starting such a club. Many predictions of a speedy failure were freely made, but so warmly was the scheme supported that soon after the club-room was opened, on October 12, 1884, it was determined to extend the original limit of fifty original members, and 109 ultimately gave in their names. So rapid was the progress of the music that the programme of the weekly concert, given on December 9, 1885, entirely consisted of compositions by members of the club. Since that date this practice has been continued at the last music meeting in the October term. In the following year Mr. G. H. Betjemann, to whom a tribute of high praise is paid, assumed the direction of the ensemble class. A new club-room was inaugurated in 1887, and in 1889 the success of the Union led to the foundation of a similar society at Cambridge, resulting in the most friendly relations existing between them, and each club annually undertaking an entire programme in the other's club-room. The Oxford Union now not only possesses an excellent library of its own, but Mr. Taphouse generously permits members access to his fine library. The programme of the invitation concert in Balliol College Hall, on June 14 last, in commemoration of the close of the first ten years of the club's existence, included Mendelssohn's Octet for strings and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet; and the programmes of the other 258 concerts, given by the members during the last ten years, contain a list of works the practice and study of which must have given incalculable pleasure, and have planted many fruitful seeds.

Fifty Years of Church Music. By W. E. Dickson, M.A. [Ely: T. A. Hills and Son.]

This little book should be read by all organists, if only to make them duly grateful for the superiority of the organs now placed at their disposal as compared with those in use during the early part of this century. But apart from this, Mr. Dickson chats about his musical experiences in so genial, yet withal thoughtful a manner, that his pages are most pleasant and instructive reading. Born in the reign of George IV., endowed with keen musical perception, and entering the Church and subsequently becoming Precentor to Ely Cathedral, the writer draws many graphic pictures of the state of church music during the last fifty years—pictures that in many cases give rise to involuntary thanksgiving that the present days are not as others were. Mr. Dickson has also some pleasant words to say about Clara Novello, Jenny Lind, and Braham, and writes: "I was the admiring neighbour (at a Concert at Drury Lane) of Mr. Braham during some ten minutes while Henry Russell was in possession of the stage, and was singing his 'Gambler's Wife.' . . . Braham listened with great attention to the younger tenor, and now and then muttered audible soliloquies, somewhat thus: 'Ha! a good G sharp! H'm, very fair, very fair!'" Subsequently he heard Braham sing "'Twas in Trafalgar's Bay," and he draws an interesting picture of the veteran tenor, then about seventy, as he stood on the great stage in "the dress of a long past day, the blue coat with large gilt buttons, the buff waistcoat, and the large shirt frill."

Posthumous Nocturne for the pianoforte. By F. Chopin. [E. Ascherberg and Co.]

The discovery, at Warsaw, of a Nocturne by the Polish composer is an event of considerable interest. One is apt to look upon such discoveries with a certain suspicion. Of a Polonaise published some twenty years ago, Professor Niecks, in his Life of Chopin, remarks: "Nothing but the composer's autograph could convince one of the genuineness of this piece." Of the Nocturne in question the same could scarcely be said; it breathes throughout the spirit of Chopin, and the music contains certain peculiar features difficult to describe, but which seem to argue strongly in favour of its genuineness. It was probably written somewhere about the date of the F minor Pianoforte Concerto; the first two bars of page 3 will recall in no vague manner a passage in the opening movement of that work. The dozen bars or so which form the middle portion of the piece are, however, so fragmentary and unsatisfactory as to suggest that they represent merely a sketch for something more extended. The flaw is all in favour of the work's authenticity however. It is a pity the publishers have afforded no information as to the history of the work. This is to unnecessarily excite suspicion.

Trio in D (Op. 1), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. By John William Ivimey. [Augener and Co.]

This Trio is a bright and engaging specimen of modern chamber music. The writer has pleasing fancy, and he expresses it in a straightforward and effective manner, and one in which the geniality of Haydn and the grace of Mozart are sometimes reflected. In the first movement the energy of the opening theme in D minor is well contrasted with the tender pleading character of the second subject in the relative major, and the interest of their development is well divided between the instruments. The Andante con moto contains some effective passages for the violin; and the Finale, Allegro molto, has for its chief theme a spirited subject in D major, the charm of which is enhanced by its suggestiveness of the old English dance. An episode in F considerably adds to the attractiveness of this movement, which throughout is well knit and cleverly written. The work, as a whole, promises well for Mr. Ivimey's Opus 2.

Lead, kindly Light. Sacred Song. By D. Pughe-Evans. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This song is an artistic and expressive setting of Newman's familiar hymn. The various changes of sentiment are effectively echoed by the music, and the conception and treatment is distinguished by a devotional fervour admirably consistent with the spirit of the text. The moderate compass of the voice part, an octave and a minor third from tenor C, renders it available to many vocalists.

Six Love Songs. Words by John Todhunter. Set to music by Bertram Luard Selby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The title "Love Songs" is scarcely a promising one, for this kind of song is so often found to be sentimental and commonplace. But No. 1, "Homeward," of this collection already shows us that Mr. Selby aims high; the words, however, are refined and they have therefore stimulated the composer and called forth his best powers. In this No. 1 the vocal part is not remarkable, but the harmonies, rhythms, and questioning cadences of the accompaniment are attractive. No. 2, "Longing," with its moments of passion, its melancholy, and its quiet close, is interesting. No. 3, "Parting," is short and clever, if somewhat artificial. Of the remaining three, the soft "Nocturne" is the most striking; the più lento with "Tristan" colouring forms an effective Coda.

The Clarinet Player's Journal.
Two Preludes. Composed by Francis B. Cooke.
Barcarolle in G minor. By Cécile Hartog.
Andante and Polacca. By William George Bentley.
[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

Messrs. Rudall, Carte are doing a good work in fostering the augmentation of the limited repertory of original music for the clarinet. The above pieces are each provided with an effective and interesting pianoforte accompaniment, and due attention has been given to the characteristics of the wind instrument. Of the present issue the Andante and Polacca would perhaps prove the most effective in performance, although the Barcarolle provides excellent opportunities for the display of gradation of tone, which forms one of the chief charms of the clarinet.

The Window; or, The Song of the Wrens. A cycle of twelve songs. Words by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. The music by Sydney Thomson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Tennyson's charming cycle of lyrics have found a sympathetic minstrel in Mr. Thomson, who has wedded them to music as dainty and refined as the spirit that pervades the verses. Each song possesses merits that will appeal to the musician and the cultured vocalist. They are, of course, set for the tenor voice, but doubtless this will prove no hindrance to their acceptance by lady vocalists. These songs should be heard in our Concert rooms, where, if well sung, they would prove extremely effective.

A Posy of Proverbs. Words by May Gillington. Illustrations by C. M. Demain Hammond. Music by Beatrice Parkyns. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

This "Posy" is an admirable example of the excellent provision now made for the musical education of our little folks. It has been said that amusement and instruction cannot be successfully combined, but in these tuneful settings of verses based on accepted proverbs this feat is surely accomplished. Grandpapas and mammas take note in this present-giving season.

Six Pieces for Violin and Pianoforte. Op. 21. By J. D. Davis. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These pieces comprise a Polonaise, Barcarolle, Mazourka, Legend, Romance, and Serenade—titles that the character of the movements fully justify. They are melodious, of moderate difficulty, especially in the violin part, and may be welcomed as a pleasing addition to the violinist's repertory.

Preliminary examinations for twelve open free Scholarships at the Royal College of Music will be held on January 30, 1895, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom. Those candidates only who may be selected at these preliminary examinations will be allowed to attend the final competition for the scholarships before the Director and Board of Professors at the College in London, on or about February 22. Official forms of application for these scholarships may be obtained at the Royal College.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Antwerp.—At the Exposition a two days' Belgian Musical Festival has been held, at which works by MM. E. Mathieu, Léon Dubois, Balthazar Florence, Sylvain Dupuis, L. Kefer, Ch. Smulders, Th. Radoux, Mdlle. Folville, Peter Benoit, E. Tinel, G. Huberti, M. Mestdagh, Fr. Servais, Van den Eeden, L. Mortelmans, A. de Greef, F. van der Stücken, and A. Wilford were performed before large and most appreciative audiences.

Berlin.—The Emperor William's "Sang an Ægir" about which so much has been heard of late, was produced at the Royal Opera House on October 28, in an arrangement, by Professor Albert Becker, for chorus and orchestra. It was, of course, encored.——At the popular Philharmonic Concert, of the 6th ult., Dr. H. Reimann played, for the first time, a new Organ Concerto in G minor, by Rheinberger. This very interesting work is equal, if not superior, to anything which the greatest living composer for the king of instruments has yet produced, and although the wood-wind instruments are not employed in the orchestral accompaniment, the instrumentation is full of quite surprising effects.——A most brilliant success rewarded the Bohemian String Quartet, consisting of Herren Karl Hoffmann, Joseph Suk, Oscar Nedbal, and Hans Wihan, who made their first appearance before a Berlin public on the 10th ult. The young artists played Smetana's "Aus meinem Leben," Dvorák's Op. 61 in C major, and Haydn's so-called "Kaiser" Quartet in a manner which Dr. Otto Lessmann styles indescribably beautiful. Their ensemble reaches the acme of perfection, and their intonation is of quite ideal purity.——A new youthful violinist, Herr Willy Burmester, who lately gave two Concerts (one of them entirely devoted to compositions by Paganini), has been hailed as a veritable Paganini redivivus. He combines with a fabulous technique a beautiful, powerful tone.

Boston, U.S.A.—The new Symphony in F by Mr. George Whitefield Chadwick (his third), which was awarded the prize of 300 dollars offered this year by the New York National Conservatoire of Music, was performed at the second Symphony Concert, under the composer's direction, and very favourably received.

Brussels. — M. Saint-Saëns's dramatic chef d'œuvre, "Samson et Dalila," was recently revived at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, after an interval of ten years, and with M. Cossira and Madame Armand in the title rôles. The composer was present and received an ovation.

Budapest.—The one-act opera, "The Violinmaker of Cremona," by the Hungarian composer, Jeno Hübay, was produced on the 10th ult., at the Royal Opera, under Herr Nikisch. The composer himself played a violin solo, which is an important feature of the work. The opera was well received.

Cologne.—Signor Puccini's opera, "Manon Lescaut," was performed for the first time at the Town Theatre on October 17, but failed to please. Only the third act created an impression.——Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera "Moses," or, rather, a very substantial portion of that enormously long work, was performed at the first Gürzenich Concert on October 23, under the direction of Professor Franz Wüllner.

Copenhagen. — At the Royal Theatre, Sophocles' "Antigone," with Mendelssohn's music, has lately been frequently performed, and always with great success.

Dortmund.—A new one-act opera, "Trinitatisnacht," by Hans Dütschke, was produced with some success at the local Town Theatre, on October 28.

Frankfort-on-Main.—The directors of the Museum-gesellschaft Concerts must credit their clients with a musical digestion of more than average robustness, considering that their bill of fare for the second Subscription Concert contained only compositions by Brahms, including some of his most intellectual works, such as the Tragic Overture, the Violin Concerto, the Variations on a Chorale by Haydn, and the first Symphony in C minor. Verily, all these be "bonnie fish and halesome farin'." Dr. Joachim was the soloist in the Concerto, and the great violinist's greater friend, the composer himself, was present.

Geneva.—On the 3rd inst. Professor H. Kling, of the Conservatoire, will deliver a Lecture in the Aula of the

Saviour, to Thy lowly bed,
There to bend the knee before
Thee Whom heaven and earth adore;
So may we with willing feet

As they offered gifts most rare
At Thy cradle rude and bare;
So may we with holy joy,
Pure and free from sin's alloy,
All our costliest treasures bring,
Christ, to Thee our heavenly King.

Holy Jesus, every day
Keep us in the narrow way;
And, when earthly things are past,
Bring our ransomed souls at last
Where they need no star to guide,
Where no clouds Thy glory hide.

In the heavenly country bright
Need they no created light;
Thou its Light, its Joy, its Crown,
Thou its Sun which goes not down;
There for ever may we sing
Alleluias to our King.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

(From a drawing by Albert Decker, 1842.)

University, on the life and works of Franz Liszt, which will be illustrated by a number of important vocal and pianoforte compositions by that master. M. Kling proposes also to affix a commemorative tablet to the house in which Liszt dwelt during his sojourn at Geneva, in 1835 and 1836. For this purpose he has opened a subscription, to which the admirers of the genius of the composer of "The Legend of Saint Elizabeth" are invited to contribute. M. Kling's address is 1, Chemin des Tranchées, Plainpalais, Geneva.

Ghent.—"Dimitri," a grand opera in five acts and six tableaux, by Victorin de Joncières, was performed for the first time in Belgium, at the local Théâtre Royal, on the 7th ult., but coldly received. The work, which was originally produced in Paris in 1876, is founded on Schiller's unfinished tragedy "Demetrius," which has also attracted other composers, such as Dvorák and Joachim.

Halberstadt. — Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera "Paradise Lost" was performed, on the 4th ult., by the combined choirs of the Halberstadt and Quedlinburg Choral Societies, conducted by Herr G. Lehnert.

Leipzig.—Dvorák's latest Symphony, "From the New World," was performed here for the first time at the fourth Subscription Concert, in the new Gewandhaus, on the 1st ult., but, in spite of an excellent performance, was coolly received. At the same Concert Madame Nordica created a veritable furore with her singing, in four languages, of no less than three operatic airs and five songs. The American prima donna appeared also with equal success at the Town Theatre as Elsa ("Lohengrin") and Violetta ("Traviata").——According to the Leipziger Tageblatt there has lately been found the register of death containing particulars of the decease and burial of Johann Sebastian Bach. It says briefly: "A man, sixty-seven years old, Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, Capellmeister and Cantor of the School of St. Thomas, and living in the Thomas School, died July 28, 1750. 4 children, minors, hearse gratis. Total, 30 thaler (=£4 10s., probably the cost of the funeral). Buried July 31, 1750."

Liège.—The sum of 100,000 francs has been left to this town by the late Madame Barbe-Lamarche, widow of M. F. J. B. Dumont. The interest on the legacy is to be spent in giving free performances of chamber music, with a view to improving the musical taste of the deceased lady's fellow citizens.

Lübeck.—This is the first town in which Herr Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was coldly received. It was performed for the first time at the Town Theatre on October 21. The house was completely sold out, but the public was extremely reserved. "More was expected of the work," sagely remarks a local paper.

Mannheim.—Henry Berény is the name of a composer hitherto unknown either to fame or to the musical press, who has joined the ranks of one-act opera writers and enriched the world of music with a work called "Talmah." It was produced here, at the Court Theatre, on October 19. The public, always thankful for small mercies, received the novelty with much kindness.

Mayence.—At its first Symphony Concert, on October 24, the town orchestra, under Herr Steinbach, produced a posthumous Symphony (his third), by the late K. J. Bishoff, which created a marked impression. The work is entitled "Œdipus"; it contains some noble music and capital workmanship.——On October 28 the Peter Cornelius memorial tablet was affixed to the house, Mittlere Bleiche, No. 38, in which the poet-composer of "The Barber of Bagdad" was born. The tablet, of black marble, bears an excellent portrait, in relief, of the master, as well as the inscription: "Birth house (rebuilt 1863) | of the word and tone poet, | Peter Cornelius. | Born 24 December, 1824; died 26 October, 1874. | Dedicated by the Mainzer Liedertafel, 1894. | The ceremony opened with a performance of Cornelius's chorus, "Deutscher Schwur," and after appropriate speeches by the president of the Liedertafel, Herr Reiff, and the Burgomaster, Dr. Gassner, Mendelssohn's "Festgesang an die Künstler" was sung at the conclusion. In the evening a Festival Concert was given, at which poems and compositions by Cornelius, excellently recited, sung, and played, formed the chief feature.

Meiningen.—At the second Subscription Concert of the Grand Ducal Court Orchestra, Miss Mary Wurm, of Plymouth, played a new MS. Pianoforte Concerto in B minor (her second) for the first time.

Melbourne (Australia).—An opera, composed by Sir William Robinson, Governor of Western Australia, and entitled "Predatoros," was produced here, on the 12th ult., at the Princess's Theatre, in the presence of the Earl and Countess of Hopetoun and a large and distinguished audience, the house being filled to its utmost capacity. The reception of the work was most enthusiastic, and the performance in every way successful.

Milan.—According to the Italia Teatrale, Signor Verdi has completed a symphonic poem entitled "Death." Can it be that the aged Maëstro has heard or seen the score of Richard Strauss's remarkable "Tod und Verklärung" ("Death and Apotheosis") and, fired with a youthful spirit of emulation, is anxious to step into the shoes of Liszt (whose most talented successor Richard Strauss may be called), and, adopting the form invented by that master, wishes to give the world his musical illustration of the great mystery? Although Verdi is hardly the man to think much of Death, there would be nothing surprising in such a fresh development of artistic activity in the ever-young composer of "Falstaff."——Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was recently performed at the Dal Verme Theatre, under the title of "Le Vispe Comari di Windsor," and very favourably received. Sorry to relate, the directors disappeared shortly afterwards, and, it is feared, with well-filled pockets. The performances at the theatre were generally well attended, but neither principals, choristers, nor orchestral players received any payment.——The new opera, "Graziella," by Signor Auteri Manzocchi, recently produced at the International Lyric Theatre, found no favour with the public. Libretto and music were declared equally uninteresting.——Signor Mascagni's opera "I Rantzau" was given for the first time at the same theatre, on the 3rd ult., and fairly well received. The popular composer himself had rehearsed the work, and he also conducted on this occasion.

Munich.—The production, under Hermann Levi, of Hans Sommer's one-act comic opera, "Saint Foix," at the Court Theatre, on October 31, was a disappointment. The new work by the composer of the beautiful opera "Loreley" was, in fact, a distinct failure, and this in spite of a most excellent performance. It was preceded by a revival of the one-act opera "Uthal," by Méhul, which was well received. This work, first produced in 1806, is peculiar in that the violins are entirely absent from the score, their place being taken by violas, in order to produce a soft and misty effect. It will be remembered that Brahms uses the same device in his Orchestral Serenade in A (Op. 16).

Paris.—Herr Siegfried Wagner, who was in Paris during the early part of November, caused the directors of the Grand Opéra to indefinitely delay the production of his father's "Tristan und Isolde," and to produce in the meantime that same "Tannhäuser" which the Parisians of 1861 hissed and yelled off the stage. According to the Journal des Débats, this decision is due to Madame Wagner's fear lest the Master's most difficult work should be "massacred," as (according to the journal in question) the "Walküre" is. Madame Wagner proposed that Felix Mottl should conduct "Tristan," whereupon the three conductors of the Grand Opéra threatened to resign if a foreigner was entrusted with the task.——At the Lamoureux Concert of the 11th ult. a lengthy selection from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" was performed. It included the magnificent duet from the "Vorspiel," sung by Frau Amalie Materna and M. Gibert, the "Trauermarsch," and the final scene. The most remarkable thing in connection with the Concert was undoubtedly the fact that the tenor, a Frenchman, sang in the original German; and Siegfried thus answered the impassioned strains of his Brünnhilde in the language of the Teuton.

Prague.—"Ein treuer Schelm" ("A Faithful Rogue"), a two-act comic opera, by Ferdinand Hummel, text by Axel Delmar, was produced at the German Theatre on October 25, with very fair success. Hitherto Herr Hummel has tried his hand only at one-act operas, "Angla" and "Mara."

Pressburg.—On October 25 Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D was sung in the Coronation Cathedral at the celebration of Mass. We doubt whether there are many precedents for a performance of the great work under such circumstances.

St. Petersburg.—The well-known musical critic, Mr. Laroche, is at present engaged on a biography of the late Peter Tschaikowsky, for which the material has been supplied by the lamented master's brother. The work will include the correspondence of the composer of the "Pathetic Symphony."

Tilsit.—The Oratorio Societies of Tilsit, Memel, Gumbinnen, and Insterburg have decided to revive the Lithuanian Musical Festivals, which have not been held since 1844. The next Festival will take place in this town on Whit-Sunday and Monday, 1895, and the programme is to include the "Elijah," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Brahms's "Song of Destiny," Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," &c.

Vienna.—The Wiener Extrablatt announces the discovery of a one-act opera by Josef Haydn. It is said to have been found in the library of Prince Esterhazy in Eisenstadt, Hungary. Further particulars are wanting.—The famous Wiener Männergesangverein performed the German Emperor's "Sang an Ægir" at a recent Concert, and forwarded the august composer the "Ehrendukat," or honorary ducat and diploma, which, according to an article in the Society's statutes, must be sent to all authors whose works are sung by this foremost of Austrian male-voice choirs for the first time.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

Sir Augustus Harris's Royal Italian Opera Company visited our city during the week beginning October 22, and gave some exceptionally fine performances, which were not, unfortunately, as well attended as their merits undoubtedly deserved. The band and chorus were infinitely superior to anything of the kind we have hitherto had here. The principal novelties introduced were Verdi's "Falstaff" (which was given twice during the week), with Mr. David Bispham in the title rôle, Signor Pini-Corsi, the Sisters Ravogli, Mdlle. Pauline Joran, and others; Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," with a splendid cast; Massenet's new opera, "La Navarraise," in which Mdlle. Pauline Joran created a distinctly favourable impression; and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"—these, with Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," Gluck's "Orfeo" (in which we heard the Sisters Ravogli at their best—a performance which evoked the greatest enthusiasm); also "Cavalleria Rusticana" and, the most popular of all Wagner's operas, "Lohengrin."

The Philharmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's ode "The New Covenant." In addition to this work there was a miscellaneous selection, in which the following artists took part: Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. Edwin Houghton, and Mr. Plunket Greene, with Miss Pauline St. Angelo (pianoforte) and Mr. Willy Hess (violin).

On the 15th ult. Mr. Lawrence Walker, assisted by Mr. Theodore Werner, of Dublin (violinist), and Miss McKisach, of this city (vocalist), gave the first of a series of Classical Vocal and Instrumental Recitals, in the Ulster (Minor) Hall, which was most successful, the hall being well filled. The members of the Royal Irish Constabulary gave a Concert in the Ulster Hall, on the 16th ult., in aid of their Widows and Orphans' Fund. The artists engaged were Mr. Josef Slivinski, Mr. Louis Duloup (solo violinist), Madame Louis Mantell, Miss Carrie Curnow, Mr. Louis Mantell, and Mr. Walter Fitchie, assisted by the band of the Royal Irish Constabulary from Dublin, Mr. Allan F. Parker acting as accompanist. The Concert was a great success, the building being crammed to its utmost capacity. "The Golden Legend" was announced for the 23rd ult., a notice of which must wait till our next issue.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

After the storm and stress of our Festival week—not to speak of the long and laborious preliminary efforts of its promoters, and the strained anticipation of the musical public—we may be pardoned if, for a certain period, we are found resting upon the oars. If, too, some of the Festival fare must be warmed and dished up again, this may seem not only an economical, but a desirable and necessary procedure, inasmuch as there are many to be contented who have not yet, for obvious reasons, been able to taste of the Festival delights. Accordingly, the Festival Choral Society, as on previous like occasions, announces the repetition of sundry of the more important and successful of the recent productions—to wit, Dr. Parry's "King Saul," G. Thomas's "Swan and Skylark," and Berlioz's "Te Deum." At the first Concert, however (the 22nd ult.), a revival of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" was given, along with excerpts from "Tannhäuser" (second and third scenes of Act 3).

Of the season already commenced, the most important event has been the Orchestral Concert given by Mr. Stockley, on the 8th ult. The most novel and notable introduction upon this occasion was a "Concert-piece" for organ and orchestra, from the pen of Dr. F. J. Sawyer, of Brighton, the work being conducted by the composer, with our City Organist, Mr. Perkins, at the organ. Dr. Sawyer's success was unmistakable, the work—sound, scholarly, and interesting in every line—making a distinct and genuine impression. The "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn and the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner were the two chief orchestral features of the programme. Miss Amy Sherwin made her first appearance here and was most warmly received; she sang Gounod's "O Divine Redeemer" and Mozart's "La Dove prende." Mr. Watkin Mills deserves mention, if only for his selection of Schubert's "Erl-King," in preference to some hackneyed modern ballad.

Mr. Percy Stranders—one of the musical professors at our Midland Institute School of Music, and who was previously engaged similarly at the Guildhall (London) School—has been giving a series of Pianoforte Recitals upon the "chronological" system. At his performance of the 1st ult., Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (No. 2) in C sharp minor was the leading feature, and a very clever rendering was given of this exacting piece. At this Concert, Miss Lee Stimpson—daughter of the late Mr. J. Stimpson, Organist at the Town Hall—made a very satisfactory début.

The first "Harrison" Concert was signalised by the re-appearance of Madame Adelina Patti. The seating capacity of our Town Hall—we have not yet quite succeeded in the substitution of the name "City Hall," by the way—was tested to its utmost on this occasion, the audience distinctly appertaining to that section of society known and esteemed by reporters generally as "the élite"; quite a Festival audience, in fact, and more so, perhaps, in point of quantity.

Miss Fanny Davies has given one of her very attractive Recitals, in aid of a deserving society, the Home for Waifs and Strays. Her most important solo was the "Waldstein" Sonata, with examples of Chopin and Schumann. Josef Hofmann—now no longer "Master," but "Mr."—has appeared again upon our horizon—viz., at Wolverhampton. The latter place has of late secured many little advantages over our Birmingham caterers, and on this occasion, undoubtedly, a more than usually interesting event must be credited to our very enterprising neighbours. Hofmann, no mere "prodigy" now, seems to have fully developed into the perfect master of his art.

The Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society inaugurated its twenty-seventh season, on the 19th ult., by an excellent performance in the Agricultural Hall of Dr. Hubert Parry's oratorio "Judith," produced at the Birmingham Festival in 1888. The fine choral numbers were excellently sung and accompanied by a chorus and orchestra of 250 performers, and the solos were entrusted to Madame Helen Trust, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Daniel Price, and Masters Edgar Ford and Willie Molineaux. Mr. Roper judiciously presided at the organ, and Mr. Swinnerton Heap conducted with his usual skill. The work was warmly received by a large audience.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mention has already been made in these columns of the musical gatherings which have been set on foot at the Clifton Spa. It is now pleasing to record the fact that the orchestral performances have advanced several grades. The band, which has been re-constituted, embraces some of the best local executants, with Mr. Theo. Carrington as Conductor. The concert schemes are made up of the best class of compositions of various schools, which are interpreted with correctness and finish. This new series of Concerts was inaugurated on October 25, and has been continued every Thursday with increasing success. On Saturdays the Concerts are of a more miscellaneous nature.

The first Popular Chamber Concert of the tenth season took place on October 27. Messrs. F. S. Gardner, Harold Bernard, and E. Pavey have been joined by Mr. F. Ward, of Birmingham, chief violinist, and Miss Mabel Rootham, the first Bristol Scholar at the Royal College of Music, in the place of Mr. Theo. Carrington and Miss Mary Lock, who have gathered round them another band of artists. Thus two executive bodies are now formed in the place of one, and it is pleasing to learn that both are receiving better support than the one formerly secured.

A pleasing exposition of the quaint and beautiful Folk-song of the West was given on October 22, at the Redland Park Hall, by Miss Mary Richardson, Miss Gage Goodfellow, Mr. Frank Pemberton, Mr. Ernest Trowbridge, and Mr. Isidore Marcil, who ably accomplished their tasks, the characters they assumed and the costumes they wore enhancing the interest of the large assemblage in the instructive entertainment.

On the 7th ult. the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir paid a return visit to Bristol, and sang from memory many compositions in the interpretation of which they excel.

Mr. George Riseley's Organ Recitals at the Colston Hall are being continued, and are being fairly well attended.

Josef Hofmann gave a Pianoforte Recital in Clifton on October 29, his wonderful playing of a varied programme of music being highly appreciated by a large assemblage.

Miss Chaminade, the well-known French composer-pianist, assisted by Mrs. J. L. Roeckel and Miss Landi, gave a Recital of her compositions in Clifton on the 17th ult.

Mr. De Vere Barrow gave a Pianoforte Recital on the 21st ult., and Mr. Slivinski paid his first visit to our city on the 24th ult.

Sir Augustus Harris's Royal Opera Company gave representations of lyrical dramas at the Prince's Theatre during the week beginning the 19th ult. The works brought forward were "Falstaff," "Les Huguenots," "Orfeo," "Philemon and Baucis," "Lohengrin," "Carmen," and Gounod's "Faust."

The Bristol Musical Festival Society's singing classes—the fourteenth session—have been re-started under the direction of Mr. Walter J. Kidner. These classes are a valuable adjunct to the Society and to the city, as they not only bring on recruits for the choir, but help considerably to spread musical education among the people.

A Festival of the church choirs of Wedmore, Allerton, Blackford, Badgworth, Mark, Theale, and Wear took place, on the 2nd ult., in the spacious church of the ancient and historic Somersetshire town, where music is cultivated to a degree much higher than is usual in small places situated so far away from railway communication. This is the ninth year the Festival has been held, and latterly such works as "Judas Maccabæus," "The Messiah," "Samson," and the "Creation" have been performed, showing that the local choirs must have attained to a considerable degree of efficiency. Haydn's immortal work was brought forward on the present occasion. The joint choirs numbered about 100; the small orchestral band was led by Mr. Windeatt, of Weston-super-Mare; the Rev. H. P. Denison presided at the organ; the soloists were Mrs. Nixon, of Thornbury; Messrs. Miller, Drayton, and Trowbridge, of Wells Cathedral; and Mr. Carter, from the same city, conducted. The performance was excellent for forces joined together so seldom.

Mr. Marchant's Choral Society brought forward Gaul's "Una" at their Concert at Clevedon, on the 7th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Susan Harrhy, Miss F. E. May, Mr. A. Button, and Mr. A. Jupp. In the second part of the programme were Mendelssohn's "Early Spring" and "The Lark's Song," and the market chorus from Auber's "Masaniello." The valuable services of Miss Marchant and Mr. A. N. Price, the instrumentalists, deserve warm recognition.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

There has been little of interest musically in Dublin to record since the summer, except the four weeks' visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera, the visit of the Royal Italian Opera Company, and Dr. Collisson's Popular Concert and Promenade Concerts.

Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a delightful Song and Pianoforte Recital, in the Leinster Hall, on the 1st ult.

A series of eighteen Chamber Music Recitals, under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society, was commenced in Leinster House on the 5th ult. Mozart's String Quartet in D minor, Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2) for pianoforte and violin, and Schumann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47) for pianoforte and strings were performed to an overflowing hall by Messrs. Papini and Delany (violins), Grisard (viola), Bast (violoncello), and Esposito (pianoforte). The second Recital was given on the 12th ult., by the same performers, and consisted of Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) for strings, Porpora's Sonata in F for violoncello, and Beethoven's great Trio in B flat (Op. 97) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The Porpora Sonata, as a complete novelty, was highly appreciated and applauded; but the Beethoven Trio, now familiar to the Leinster House audiences, seemed to suffer by comparison with some of its previous presentations by the same executants.

A series of twelve Violin Recitals by Herr Werner was begun in the Arts Club on the 13th ult., when the distinguished artist offered his friends a choice programme of classical violin music.

The announcement of the appointment of Mr. Ebenezer Prout as Professor of Music in Dublin University, in succession to the late Sir Robert Stewart, has not given satisfaction to the members of the Dublin musical profession, who expected that a selection would be made from amongst their own body.

Mrs. Scott Ffennell's annual Concert, in the Antient Concert Rooms, on the 17th ult., was a highly artistic and successful entertainment.

Prospective arrangements for the season are the "Creation," by the Dublin University Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Marchant; the same, by the St. George's Choral Society, under Mr. Raymond Reville; and the following announcements of the Dublin Musical Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Joseph Smith: First Concert — Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal"; second Concert—Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; third Concert—Dr. Joseph Smith's "Festal Mass" (composed for the Dublin Musical Society) and Sullivan's "Ivanhoe."

The annual Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians will be held in Dublin during the first week of January next.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The idea of establishing a School of Music in Norwich, which has long been talked of, appears to have taken root, for, the necessary capital having been promised, a company has been formed (not for profit), suitable rooms have been secured, and it is expected the School will be at work in January next. The ninth annual Concert, organised to aid the Norwich District of the Railway Guards' Friendly Society, took place in St. Andrew's Hall, on Thursday evening, October 25, in the presence of a large and enthusiastic audience. Under the direction of Mr. Spencer Lorraine, several eminent artists gave a very satisfactory evening's entertainment, which was obviously much enjoyed. The popular Organ Recitals, which occupy the Saturday evenings during the winter, were commenced again, in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 3rd ult. The City Organist (Dr. Bunnett) officiated, and a large audience appeared thoroughly to enjoy the excellent performance. The mayor, sheriff, and many members of the corporate body were present. Miss Clara Dowle and the new Cathedral Precentor (Rev. J. I. Thomas) contributed several songs, and Mr. W. Tuddenham played two violin solos. At the Grand Oriental Bazaar, opened in the large Agricultural Hall, on the 6th ult., and organised to defray debts incurred by the Church of England Young Men's Society and the Young Men's Christian Association—both deserving institutions—short Concerts were given each afternoon and evening under the superintendence of our principal professional ladies and gentlemen—viz., Madame Serruys, Madame Slonitz, Dr. Bunnett, Dr. Bates, Dr. Hill, Mr. Kingston Rudd, and Mr. Ernest Harcourt. With the assistance of the best available amateur talent really first-class entertainments were given and largely patronised. The Ladies' Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, ably occupied one afternoon, while the Norwich Orchestral Union, numbering upwards of 100 performers, under Mr. Ernest Harcourt, were responsible for another programme, which was very creditably executed. Thanks are due to Mr. W. R. C. Howlett and Mr. W. E. Hansell, who had charge of the musical department, for providing such enjoyable treats. The members of the Norfolk and Suffolk Church Choral Association have taken advantage of the opportunity of the marriage of Dr. Bates (Organist of Norwich Cathedral), their honorary Organist and Director, to present that gentleman with a handsome silver service. The presentation was made on the 15th ult., in the presence of a few subscribers and friends, by the Dean of Norwich (Dr. Lefroy), who, at the same time, asked the organist's acceptance of a silver salver on behalf of himself and the Chapter as a mark of the esteem in which he was held by all connected with the Cathedral.

The Great Yarmouth Orchestral Society, which numbers upwards of forty active members, gave its third annual Concert, on the 6th ult., in the Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. C. W. Moss. The first violins were good, and so was the wind, especially the wood department; but the second violins, violas, and violoncellos need strengthening in numbers and quality. Two novelties in the programme were a Romance and Gavotte composed by Miss G. Bracey (a native of Yarmouth). The vocalists were Miss G. Bracey, Miss Laura Pearson, and Mr. T. H. Harrison, while the duties of accompanist were shared by Mr. C. W. Moss and Mr. J. F. W. Bray. The Carrodus String Quartet visited Yarmouth on the 15th ult., and, as usual, received a warm and appreciative welcome. Miss Jane Bridges was the vocalist. The resignation, by Mr. Henry Stonex, of the post of Organist of St. Nicholas, has been received by all classes in the borough with unfeigned regret. Failing health is unfortunately the cause for severing a connection which has existed forty years, and the same reason compels Mr. Stonex to give up the conductorship of the Musical Society, which, under his judicious and careful training for nearly thirty years, has reached a high standard of excellence.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The record of music in Edinburgh for last month is wanting neither in novelty nor in interest. The most important event has been the production of Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new opera, "Jeanie Deans"—the first opera première that has honoured Edinburgh in this generation. A detailed notice of the work will be found in another column, and it is only necessary to say here that a crowded house extended a most cordial and enthusiastic welcome to the opera and to its young composer. There was also a call for Mr. Bennett which, however, was not responded to. The répertoire of the Royal Carl Rosa Company included, besides "Jeanie Deans," "Tannhäuser" (in which Mr. Hedmondt was as impressive as ever, and Mr. Paull won an immediate success as Wolfram), "Esmeralda," the "Merry Wives of Windsor," and "Carmen" (Madame Duma, Miss Estey, Fräulein Meisslinger, &c.).

The Scottish Orchestra, under Mr. Henschel, has made a splendid beginning to what promises to be an exceptionally interesting season. Indeed, the performances of the "Peer Gynt" music and Haydn's lovely E flat Symphony (the "Paukenwirbel"), and some other orchestral pieces, were well-nigh perfect. Mr. Rivarde was the solo violinist at the first Concert, and gave a brilliant and artistic interpretation of Saint-Saëns's Concerto. The magic of Mr. Lloyd's name was largely instrumental in attracting an overflowing audience to the second Concert. He sang "Adelaide," "Lohengrin's Farewell," and "Lend me your aid," evoking the greatest enthusiasm.

At the third Concert, on the 19th ult., Madame Hopekirk appeared in her native city in the dual capacity of pianist and composer. Her "Concertstück," produced for the first time in this country, proved the most important composition she has, as yet, presented to the public; and its musical interest and the freedom of its technical treatment secured Madame Hopekirk a double recall. Her fine interpretation was supported by a sympathetic accompaniment. The Symphony was Schubert in B flat (No. 5), and the Overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhäuser" and the "Danse Maccabre" were also included in the programme.

The Edinburgh Society of Musicians signalised the opening of its fine new premises in 5, Queen Street, by a reception, presided over by Professor Niecks, who gave a short address. The Reception was followed by a Concert (Spohr's Nonette, pianoforte and violoncello solos, and part-songs) in the Queen Street Hall, while in the Musicians' Rooms was arranged a most interesting collection of musical MSS., autographs, pictures, instruments, and curios. More than £10,000 worth was said to have been in the cases, the violins alone averaging about four figures each.

The Edinburgh Bach Society inaugurated its seventh session, on the 9th ult., by a very successful Concert in the Freemasons' Hall, at which the most important compositions presented to the members were a ninefold Concerto (for three violins, three violas, and three violoncellos, with cembalo) and the beautiful C major Concerto for three pianofortes. Mrs. Caird played the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, and Miss Helen Macgregor the well-known Bourrée and Preludium from the Violin Sonatas. The Misses Gray sang the "Christe Eleison" from the B minor Mass, and Fräulein Bertha Martini in "Mein gläubiges Herze" and Miss Dora Lichtenstein in "Ein ungetärbt Gemüthe" were warmly applauded. Mr. Franklin Peterson, President of the Society, conducted the concerted numbers. The Society numbers now about 250 members. There was a large attendance.

Messrs. Wood's annual engagement of Sir Charles and Lady Hallé proved as attractive as ever, and a large and sympathetic audience responded as of yore to the charm of the great violinist's bow, and to the genuine and classic interpretations of the eminent pianist. Three of Sir Charles Hallé's own compositions were particularly interesting to hear from his own fingers, and Lady Hallé's greatest success was in a Fantasie by Vieuxtemps.

Messrs. Paterson's public-spirited scheme of Saturday evening Concerts at popular prices met with splendid support on the 10th ult. The chief numbers on the programme were the "Scotch" Symphony and German's clever "Henry VIII." music. The vocalist was Miss Edmée de Dreux, who achieved a distinct success, and was three times recalled after a familiar Welsh song.

Mr. A. Reynolds played, on the 1st ult., an artistic selection of organ music in St. Andrew's Free Church. Two vocal solos were sung by Miss Bell McGregor.

The musical season in Perth opened on the 16th ult. with an operatic performance. Mr. Grave's Amateur Opera Company gave two representations of the "Pirates of Penzance" in a remarkably creditable manner. The parts were filled entirely by local amateurs, with the exception of Miss M. Newlands, of Glasgow, who sang the music of Mabel with great effect. A performance, in concert form, of "Cavalleria Rusticana," by the Perth Musical Society, was given at the end of the month.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

An uncommonly large audience welcomed the Scottish Orchestra, on the evening of the 3rd ult., when the first popular Concert of the series took place. The programme was excellent, and many amateurs were pleased to find that it contained Haydn's Symphony in E flat (No. 8 of the Salomon set). Mrs. Henschel sang, and once more captivated her audience by reason of her artistic method.

On the 6th ult. Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" was revived, and with a cast which included Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Lempriere Pringle. Strange, however, to say the audience was not large—a conundrum which utterly puzzles any one to solve. Certain it is at any rate that, as an all-round performance, there was little or nothing left to be desired. Another comparatively small audience attended at the third Classical Concert. Goldmark's Overture to "Sappho" opened the Concert. This was, to be sure, a novelty of some consequence, inasmuch as the composer appeals to his audience in, presumably, his very latest phase. The Tschaikowsky Concerto (No. 1) in B flat minor gave Mr. Slivinski a brilliant chance. That he made the most of it goes without saying, but it may be questioned if the much-lauded work has gained many friends hereabouts. On the other hand, everybody was charmed with Schubert's Symphony (No. 5 in B flat), a gay, bright, and tuneful composition, which might in several respects have been penned by old "Papa Haydn" himself. Here again the Scottish Orchestra excelled itself—a very fine performance indeed. On the 17th ult. a singularly choice selection was submitted at the second Popular Concert, and what with the "Oberon" Overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, extracts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and Mr. Edward German's Dances from "Henry VIII.," nobody had any ground for complaint on the score of dulness. For the fourth Classical Concert—27th ult.—Mr. Maurice Sons was announced to play in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Dvorák's New Symphony (No. 5, in E) was also down for its first hearing in Glasgow.

The Glasgow Choral Union revived Haydn's "Creation" on the 26th ult., with Madame Fanny Moody, Mr. John Child, and Mr. Charles Manners as the soloists. Mr. Joseph Bradley conducted, and the accompaniments were in the safe charge of the Scottish Orchestra. The "Union" has just temporarily lost the valued services of Mr. Allan W. Young, a man of rare mark in Glasgow musical circles. As president of our premier choral society, and in many another capacity, Mr. Young has earned the highest opinions. His sagacious counsel, administrative ability, and kindly ways have indeed won for him a corner in all hearts, and it is cheering to know that much-needed rest has already worked wonders in restoring him to his wonted health.

Just as these notes are being sent ample confirmation has been received of Mr. Henschel's retirement from the conductorship of the Scottish Orchestra. The resignation will not, of course, take effect until the close of the present season.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony formed the foundation of the third Concert of the Philharmonic Society, given on the 6th ult., and the familiar work received a fitting and traditional rendering at the hands of Sir Charles Hallé and his orchestra. Dvorák's "Carnival" Overture was a novelty, and fully answered the expectations suggested by its title. Another highly welcome contribution to the programme was a series of Horn Quartets admirably played by members of the regular Manchester band. At the fourth Concert, on the 20th ult., Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job" and Tinel's "Lay of the Poppies" afforded the first important work in which the choristers have been engaged this season. Of the oratorio a generally good interpretation was given, under the conductorship of the composer, and, as has been the case with all else of Dr. Parry's, this fine sample of the best side of English art in the present century met with unmistakable acceptance.

The Sunday Concerts are assuming a serious artistic position, and on the 11th ult., in St. George's Hall, where the first of the long since extinct Monday "Pops" was given a quarter of a century or so ago, the directorate of the Society concerned risked a performance by the Schiever Quartet. The audience numbered over three thousand, mainly recruited from the working and middle classes of the community, and the building is but little adapted to the perfect hearing of chamber music; but the result fully justified the experiment.

The Musical Society gave, on October 30, Handel's "Samson," in St. George's Hall, and again placed in evidence the excellent choral material at the disposal of the Conductor, Mr. D. O. Parry. The work of the orchestra and organ unfortunately militated against the all-round excellence of the performance. The Birkenhead Cambrian Choral Society, which has a good deal in common with the Liverpool Musical Society, gave a miscellaneous Concert in the Cheshire suburb, on the 10th ult., under the same Conductor.

On the 15th ult. Miss Emilie Scott, one of the most popular of our local professors and performers, was supported by a host of friends at her first benefit Concert. On the same evening the second Smoking Concert of the Orchestral Society, under Mr. Rodewald, proved, as usual, a genuine treat. Sir Augustus Harris's Italian Opera Company was with us for a week from October 29, with the result of excellent performances, but, unfortunately, meagre audiences. Mr. Goossens' new Male-Voice Choral Society has made a good start, about one hundred members having been enrolled. Spohr's "Last Judgment" is again in hand for the Advent performance of Oratorio at the pro-Cathedral, under Mr. Burstall. The Runcorn Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Crossley, announced Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea" for the 6th ult.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

November has been a somewhat busy month with us. The star Concerts, undertaken by Messrs. Harrison in conjunction with Messrs. Hime, of this city, promise to take very firm root here. They fill up a gap in our round of musical pleasures; for, after all that may be said in depreciation of miscellaneous programmes, it is very natural that we should occasionally delight in listening to the most eminent vocal artists of the day, some of whom are far too costly to be ventured upon in conjunction with the expenses of an orchestra. And so long as the charm of Madame Patti's style remains, the public will be extremely reluctant to bid farewell to the last of a really great race of singers.

It is difficult to foresee what will be the future of opera in the provinces. A part of Sir Augustus Harris's company was here for a week; and although there was no specially attractive name in the bills, yet some of the parts were excellently filled, and scarcely in one was there a manifest deficiency. The orchestra, of about forty, was excellent for its numbers, well fitted for its task, and under adequate control. Each evening a fresh work was given; and it is especially noteworthy that the two absolute novelties—Verdi's "Falstaff" (in which Mr. David Bispham was admirable) and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"—went farther toward filling the Theatre Royal than any of the better known works. The attendance was, generally, fair; but so obviously not remunerative that it is very unlikely the speculation will be repeated. It is impossible that we should, in the country, have the principal characters undertaken by the most popular lyric artists of the day, and at the same time secure an all-round excellence of performance. Must we give up opera altogether, or be satisfied with a moderate provision of necessary talent?

We have already had two of the eight Oratorios of Sir Charles Hallé's subscription series—"The Creation" and "Judas." But, while there is nothing new to chronicle as respects choral work, we have a fair record of energy in the provision of orchestral novelty. The first half of the new Symphony of Dvorák is, in many respects, extremely interesting and full of life and vigour, as the title, "From the New World," leads one to expect. The themes are fresh, many of them having the wild charm of melodies founded upon the older modes common to various parts of the world ere our modern scales were reached. The simple air which forms the basis of the Adagio—and was so charmingly played on the Corno Inglese by Mr. Charles Reynolds—has just the sad plaintiveness of an old Scottish lament.

To the Concert on the 22nd ult. a bumper audience was attracted by Mr. Leonard Borwick, who strengthened the impression he made here last season. He won a double recall by his interpretation of Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and aroused even greater enthusiasm by some smaller pieces. Miss Ethel Wood (a student at the Royal Manchester College of Music) was ready to appear instead of Mdlle. Trebelli, who was indisposed, and she availed herself of the opportunity of displaying a beautiful soprano voice, clear enunciation, a steady tone, and admirable self-possession.

The "Gentlemen's Concerts" commenced with a Conversazione, at which Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Carl Fuchs gave some pleasant music, and two young vocal students of the Royal Manchester College—Misses Grime and Bardsley—showed promise which ought not to be retarded by too early display. On the afternoon of the 14th ult. Mr. F. Dawson gave a Recital, wherein Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, the "Papillons" of Schumann, Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," and selections from Chopin and Liszt were interpreted in a manner which somewhat surprised those who, until the London critics discovered the fact, were not aware that our young Manchester pianist is able to play with great expression, as well as with unsurpassed mastery of all executive difficulties. An extremely interesting programme of chamber music attracted to the first of the four Concerts of Mr. Willy Hess, on the 12th ult., a very encouraging audience. Among other admirable pieces were the Violin and Pianoforte Duet (Op. 100) of Brahms, ably played by Messrs. Hess and Max Mayer, and the new String Quintet in E flat of Dvorák, the early repetition of which would be welcome. And it is more than pleasant to be able to record a third Recital of chamber music during the month—that of Mr. Ed. Sachs, at the Schiller-Austalt, at which works of Schumann, Dvorák, Grieg, and Christian Sinding were ably rendered by the Concert-giver, with Messrs. Risegari, Speelman, Nichols, and Vieuxtemps. In addition to supplying vocalists for the requirements of the Gentlemen's Conversazione, the authorities of the College of Music have started a series of monthly Students' Concerts. At the first, Quartets by Dittersdorf and Mozart and organ and pianoforte solos were well given, as well as a good deal of vocal music.

More than ordinary interest attached to Mr. Cross's Concert on the 10th ult., through the introduction of a small orchestra for the rendering of Dr. Coward's new cantata, "The King's Error," previously produced at the Crystal Palace. It cannot be said that the performance was adequate; but it was sufficient to create a desire to be able to judge more fairly the merits of a work of which the eight-part chorus, "The Word of the Lord," is certainly the gem.

A strong desire having been expressed by the many members of the Royal College of Organists resident in Lancashire and Yorkshire to have occasional meetings under the auspices of the Council of the College, a course of Lectures has been arranged, of which the first was delivered on the 17th ult. by Dr. Henry Hiles, of the Victoria University, on the relationship of the organ to the orchestra. The large gathering of members and friends was very encouraging, and a feeling of loyalty to the College was repeatedly expressed, together with an earnest wish that its provincial graduates may, by this new undertaking, be permitted to bear their share in increasing and spreading its usefulness.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

Although the season is steadily advancing, very little in the way of good music has been heard in this locality during the past month. It is questionable whether any other town of equal size and importance is so badly off for performances of important works for voices and orchestra as Newcastle-upon-Tyne. There was a time, some dozen years or more ago, when oratorios and cantatas were frequently heard here, but during recent years the production of any important work of the kind has become quite a rare event. A performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" is promised, at the end of February, by the Gateshead Choral Society, and there are rumours of possible performances of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" and Dr. Joseph Parry's "Saul of Tarsus," by Dr. Rea's Choir and the Newcastle Harmonic Society respectively, but, so far as can be ascertained, no other work of the kind is announced. Most towns of one-quarter the size are better off than Newcastle in this respect.

Perhaps the most successful musical society in the North of England is the Newcastle Chamber Music Society, whose first Concert of the season took place on October 31. The performers were Messrs. Bent, Sutcliffe, Wall, Ackroyd, Hobday, Kearne, Ludwig, and Blagrove, together with Mr. John Sandbrook as vocalist and Mr. James M. Preston at the pianoforte. The chief pieces in the programme were Brahms's Sextet in B flat (Op. 18) for strings and Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat (Op. 20).

So successful are the Concerts of the Chamber Music Society that the committee are able to give the subscribers an extra Concert annually, for which no charge is made. This Concert took place on the 14th ult., and for the occasion the Scottish Orchestra was engaged, under the conductorship of Mr. Henschel. The programme included —Overture, "Britannia" (Mackenzie); Concerto for violin (No. 3), Saint-Saëns; Symphony, "Scotch" (Mendelssohn); vocal scena from "King Saul" (Parry); violin solo, "Romance" (Svendsen); and Overture to "Sappho" (Goldmark). The violinist was Mr. Achille Rivarde, whose efforts were deservedly applauded. Much interest was centred in the excerpt from Dr. Parry's latest Oratorio, which was sung by Mr. Henschel, and created a desire among many of those present to hear the entire work.

On the 6th ult. Mr. J. H. Beers—to whom Northern amateurs are much indebted for opportunities of hearing many classical chamber works not previously given in Newcastle—gave his first Chamber Music Concert of the season. The novelty on this occasion was a Quintet, by G. Onslow, which was very well played and much appreciated. The vocalist was Miss Cecilia Armytage.

On the 28th ult. a Concert was announced to be given in Newcastle by Miss Maud May, a local pianist of considerable attainments. The vocalist engaged for the occasion was Miss Clara Butt, who is a very great favourite in this locality.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

For several weeks the members of the North Staffordshire Philharmonic Society have been looking forward to the performance of "Samson," which took place on the 15th ult., before a large audience, in the Victoria Hall, Hanley. The Society appears to have "weathered" the wave of indifference to its claims. The principals engaged—Miss Emily Davies, Miss Marie Hooten, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Dan Price—gave an excellent interpretation of the solo work. The chorus may be complimented upon its work, but the male voices should be strengthened. The orchestra (drawn from Birmingham), with Mr. Fred. Ward as leader, rendered valuable aid, while Mr. Sherratt was at the organ, and Dr. Swinnerton Heap was Conductor. The hon. secretary, Mr. W. T. Bennett, is to be congratulated upon his admirable arrangements. The Society will now rehearse "Elijah" for the February Concert.

On the 14th ult., at Congleton, the Hanley and Stoke Glee Union (with the Rev. J. G. Elstob as judge) secured first prize for a splendid rendering of Miller's "May Day." The vocalists of the Union are Mrs. Winkle, Miss F. Bridgett, Mrs. Johnson, Miss N. C. Fowler, and Messrs. T. Leigh, F. W. Norcop, C. L. Forrester, and T. Relphs. The Tunstall Glee Union gained the second prize.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The season now commencing promises no novelty in choral work. Both Sacred Harmonic and Philharmonic Societies only find safety in repetitions or revivals of old work. The former gave a third repetition of Gounod's "Faust" as its opening Concert on October 25, when Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Alice Moody, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Charles Manners, and Mr. Brockbank sustained the principal rôles. These, with the fine chorus of the Society and full orchestra, made it impossible to have other than a good performance.

The Philharmonic Choir opened on the 8th ult. with a miscellaneous Concert, the principal vocalists being Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Ffrangçon Davies; while Mr. Philip Cathie gave violin solos and Mr. Clement Locknane presided at the pianoforte. The choir is keeping up in numbers and efficiency, under the direction of Mr. Marshall-Ward.

Herr Ellenberger is vigorously pursuing his policy of presenting a large proportion of locally unknown works at his Chamber Concerts, and continues to receive adequate support. Dvorák's Quartet in E flat was excellently rendered, at his first Concert, by Herr Ellenberger, Mr. Courvoisier, Mr. Thorpe, and Miss Ellenberger. Miss Ellenberger's pianoforte solos were enthusiastically received, and Herr Ellenberger gave a thoroughly artistic reading of Tartini's Violin Sonata in G minor. Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in D major (Op. 70) completed the programme.

Despite lack of encouragement during three seasons, Mr. Allen has determined to essay another season of his Classical Concerts, and opened on the 7th ult. with Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, Mr. Speelmann (viola), and Mr. Carl Fuchs (violoncello). Brahms's Quartet in B flat was grandly played, and the Concert was an entire success.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The music of the month opened on the 1st ult. with the second of Mr. Charles Harvey's Subscription Concerts. The concert-party included the Meister Glee Singers, Miss Antoinette Trebelli, Madame Gomez, Miss Mabel Berrey, Mr. Leo Stern, and Mr. E. P. Reynolds (pianoforte). Madame Hast accompanied.

On the 5th ult. Mr. Frederick Dawson gave an interesting Pianoforte Recital at the Sheffield Press Club. The concert-room of the club was crowded with a representative professional and artistic audience. Thorough appreciation of the clever pianist's efforts was cordially expressed. During the evening a fine portrait of Mr. Dawson, painted by Mr. Ernest Moore, was presented to the Club.

The Royal Italian Opera Company visited the Theatre Royal and gave seven performances during the week commencing the 5th ult. "Falstaff," "Orfeo," "Philemon and Baucis," "Faust," "Carmen," "Les Huguenots," "Pagliacci," and "Cavalleria" made up the repertory. The chief successes of the week were those of the Sisters Ravogli in "Orfeo," and Mr. Brozel in "Pagliacci."

The members of the Derby Choral Union, finding their Society heavily in debt, held a Bazaar on the first three days of the past month, and so successful was the venture that the proceeds exceeded £400, and the Choral Union is now firmly established with about £200 to the good. Such a result is highly gratifying, and the experiment is worthy of emulation by other financially embarrassed musical societies.

The death of Mr. J. H. Kirk, of Doncaster, at the early age of forty-four, removes a much respected musician from South Yorkshire. Mr. Kirk acted as Choirmaster at the Parish Church for a period of twenty-five years, and for seven years conducted the Doncaster Choral Society. The regret felt at his untimely death is deep and widespread.

On the 20th ult. the Choral Union gave a Concert performance of Flotow's opera "Martha," under the direction of Mr. S. Suckley.

MUSIC IN WILTS AND HANTS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Proof of the still growing popularity of the well-known Test Valley Musical Society was afforded on October 29, when a large and influential audience gathered together in the County Hall, Salisbury, on the occasion of the opening Concert of the Society's fourteenth season. The programme was well arranged, and embraced many compositions, new at least to amateurs in this district, amongst them being Julius Klengel's Serenade for strings (Op. 24)—a bright and rhythmical work—and the Adagio and Intermezzo from a Serenade (Op. 44) by Ferdinand Thieriot. The rendering, by Mr. Moberly's orchestra, of these novelties was everything that could be desired, not a nuance nor a turn of expression being left unobserved. The Concert was, of course, not without choral music, but the efforts of the fine choir were limited to a selection of part-songs and madrigals. John Benet's "Thyrsis, sleepest thou?" Wilbye's "Thus saith my Chloris bright," Raff's "Day is at last departing" (ladies' voices), and Hamish MacCunn's "Oh, where art thou dreaming?" were all given with wonderful precision and finish. Harford Lloyd's chorus "Allan-a-Dale" was a capital performance, but the chief choral success was in Macfarren's "Orpheus with his lute," which was sung with a beauty of tone, perfection of shading, and refinement of expression which reflected the greatest credit upon all concerned. The vocal soloist was Mrs. Hutchinson, who sang songs by Schumann, Schubert, Purcell, and Dr. Blow with her accustomed success. The Concert was repeated on the following day at the Guildhall, Winchester.

The Salisbury Philharmonic Society gave its annual Concert on the 21st ult. The chief pieces by the choir were Macfarren's "May Day," Eaton Faning's choral ballad "The Miller's Wooing," and the same composer's part-song "Moonlight." Haydn's Symphony in D and one or two smaller works were played by the orchestra, led by Mr. F. L. Bartlett, and Mr. G. Hubert Smith gave a pianoforte solo. The principal vocalists were Miss Margaret Barter, Miss Edith Hands, and Mr. W. J. Nesbitt. Miss Ethel Awdry undertook the duties of accompanist, and Mr. Alfred Foley was the Conductor.

Mr. J. M. Hayden, assisted by the Salisbury Vocal Union and his newly-organised juvenile choir, gave a successful Concert, in the County Hall, on the 7th ult. The programme consisted of excerpts from the oratorios and the usual miscellaneous selection. Mrs. Harcourt Coates and several pupils of the Concert-giver appeared as soloists, Mr. Hayden himself officiating as Conductor.

The fourteenth season of the Portsmouth Philharmonic Society was opened, on the 15th ult., by two excellent performances of "The Golden Legend," the training of the choir reflecting the greatest credit upon Mr. A. Williams, the Conductor of the Society. With such experienced artists as Miss Medora Henson, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. David Hughes, the solo parts received full justice, and the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. S. Hawkins, was of excellent quality. At each Concert the cantata was preceded by a tenor solo and unaccompanied trio from Mr. Williams's setting of the Thirtieth Psalm.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

During the past month there has been considerable musical activity in Yorkshire. In the case of Leeds, a three weeks' visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Company has supplied the town with an unusual allowance of opera. The feature of the season has been the popularity of Wagner, whose "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," and "Lohengrin" were given to crowded houses. Fourteen complete operas were mounted, with an excellence of ensemble that left nothing to be desired save a larger band. A band of thirty-five is obviously unable to do justice to modern scores, however efficient its members may be; but in Leeds, where prices ranging from four shillings downwards are complained of as excessive, quality is perhaps not so much desired as cheapness. The most important event in Leeds up to now has been the Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on the 14th ult. Dr. Parry conducted his Oratorio "Job," and the performance was one of very remarkable merit, in all probability the best that has yet taken place, for it certainly transcended those of the Three Choirs Festival. The principal vocalists were Mr. Plunket Greene, whose splendidly pathetic declamation added point to Job's great solo; Messrs. Branscombe and Bantock Pierpoint, and Master Sterndale Bennett, an unusually accomplished representative of the Shepherd Boy. The second part of the programme was equally interesting. It included Beethoven's Choral Fantasia—the pianist being Mr. Alfred Broughton, the Society's Conductor, whose playing was marked by excellent musical feeling—and Brahms's "Song of Destiny." The Philharmonic Society has assuredly never appeared to better advantage than at this memorable Concert. Messrs. Haddock's "Musical Evenings" began what promises to be a successful season on October 30. Miss Janotha was the pianist, Miss Ethel Barns the violinist, and Mr. Hollman the violoncellist; and the singers were Miss Thudichum, Miss Curnow, Messrs. Braxton Smith and Foli. The programme gave pleasure to a large audience, but was of no general interest. The second evening, on the 20th ult., had more musical interest. Madame Duma, Madame de Swiatlowsky, and Mr. H. Chilver Wilson were the vocalists; Miss St. Angelo, Mr. Popper, and Mr. Edgar Haddock the instrumentalists. Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor was the most important feature of the programme. On the 19th ult. Mr. Slivinski gave a Pianoforte Recital, distinguishing himself especially in his interpretation of Chopin and Schumann; and on the evening of the same day an interesting programme of chamber music was offered at Mr. Christensen's Concert.

The Bradford Subscription Concerts entered upon their thirteenth season on October 26. The chief thing in a programme of orchestral music was Dvorák's last Symphony, "From the New World," of which a sympathetic reading was furnished by Sir Charles Hallé's band. The charming spontaneous melody and masterly orchestration made an excellent impression. Dr. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture, on the other hand, received far less satisfactory treatment. Mr. Leonard Borwick played Chopin's E minor Concerto with perfect technical skill and the utmost refinement of taste, and Mr. Lundquist, the Swedish baritone, sang Söderman's very interesting "Tannhäuser" Ballade with admirable expression. To baritones capable of genuine dramatic expression this composition should prove a welcome "find." On the 9th ult. the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" to an overflowing house. Miss Pattie Hughes, Miss Dorothy Jackson, Mrs. Howson, Messrs. Blagbro and Andrew Black were the vocalists. The chorus sang as well as was to be expected in so familiar a work; but the chief matter of interest in the performance was the engagement of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra to undertake the task of accompanying. This was a step in the right direction, for an organised body is worth much more than a "scratch band," and the policy was fully justified by the result. Mr. W. H. Garland conducted. On the 2nd ult. a "Patti" Concert of the usual type took place in Bradford. Madame Patti's catholicity was shown by the inclusion of the prayer from "Tannhäuser" (which, according to a local critic, she "rendered with an accuracy of note seldom attained on the operatic stage"), together with "Home, sweet home." Miss Hilda Crosse, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Brockbank were the other vocalists; and Jean Gérardy and his sister, Miss Thérèse Gérardy, the instrumentalists.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts have maintained a higher level than usual during the past month. After the Richter Concert mentioned in our last notice, a highly interesting Pianoforte Recital was given on October 23, by Mr. Josef Hofmann, who, as an adult artist, maintains the promise shown by him as an infant prodigy. At the next Subscription Concert, on the 6th ult., Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick gave one of their delightful Vocal and Pianoforte Recitals. Mr. Greene sang fifteen songs, and Mr. Borwick played Beethoven's C minor Sonata (Op. 111) and other solos. The result was one of the most delightful musical entertainments imaginable. On the 20th ult. a miscellaneous programme was furnished by Madame Albani, Miss Shinner, and Sir Walter Parratt. To judge from the size of the audience, this was the most attractive Concert of the season up to the present. Madame Albani's solos were of the most hackneyed description—"Qui la voce," "Home, sweet home," and the like, with the exception of the Ballatella from "Pagliacci." On October 26 the Huddersfield Choral Society, under Mr. John Bowling's conductorship, gave a Concert, the programme including two such diverse works as Brahms's "Schicksalslied" and Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist." The latter is, perhaps, the best worth reviving of any of the late Cambridge professor's works, but it hardly appeared to advantage beside the spontaneous and poetic work of Brahms. Though the orchestra was indifferent, the performance was in other respects creditable. Miss Medora Henson, Miss Jessie King, Messrs. Houghton and Andrew Black were the vocalists.

The Dewsbury Choral Society gave, on the 13th ult., a Concert of quite exceptional interest. Advantage was taken of Dr. Parry's visit to Yorkshire to get him to conduct his "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," of which a capital performance was given, the chorus singing with an amount of expression and finish that reflected infinite credit on the Society's Conductor, Mr. G. H. Hirst. Brahms's "Song of Destiny," which has had quite a "run" in Yorkshire since its performance at the last Leeds Festival, received a remarkably sympathetic and, indeed, poetic rendering, under Mr. Hirst's conductorship. The programme also included a selection from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the "Meistersinger" Overture, and solos by the principals, Madame Annie Marriott and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. After the Concert the members of the Society showed their appreciation of Dr. Parry's services by giving him a silver cigar case. On the 16th ult. the Halifax Choral Society, of which Mr. W. H. Garland is Conductor, gave Berlioz's "Faust," with the assistance of Sir Charles Hallé and his band. Mr. Watkin Mills was as successful as ever in the part of Mephistopheles, and seemed more at home in the work than his colleagues, Madame Clara Leighton, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Albert Barnes. The chorus was excellent. At Wakefield the first Subscription Concert took place on the 8th ult., when Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick gave a Recital similar to that already mentioned. Haydn's "Seasons" was the work chosen for the opening Concert of the Keighley Musical Union, on the 13th ult. The band might have been better, but otherwise the performance was satisfactory. Miss Maggie Davies, Messrs. T. Child and David Hughes were the principal vocalists, and Mr. Arthur Burnley conducted.

Professor Herkomer, whose versatility surely entitles us to speak of him as an "admirable Crichton" among artists, has recently composed a set of six easy pieces for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, entitled respectively "Fruhlingslied," "Klagelied," "Liebeslied," "Herbstlied," "Wanderlied," and "Abendlied." These will be published in a few days by Messrs. Novello, in the form of an album, with six full-page (folio) illustrations from original drawings on the stone by Professor Herkomer. The artistic value of the album is not likely to be overlooked by those who appreciate a beautiful thing.

At the examination for degrees in music at the University of Oxford the following passed:—First examination for the degree of Mus. Bac.—W. E. Abraham, Queen's College and Hull; G. H. Cole, Queen's College and Cardiff; A. H. Edwards, Queen's College and Brecon; D. Evans, Queen's College and Forest Gate; C. Green, Queen's College and Kildwick, Yorks; J. Hurst, Queen's College and Camden Road; C. H. Kitson, St. Edmund Hall and Ripon; C. E. de M. Leathes, non-collegiate and Reedham, Norfolk; T. W. Morgan, Queen's College and Bangor; F. Mummery, St. Edmund Hall and Taunton; B. F. Ramsey, Worcester College and Bournemouth; A. E. Tozer, New College and West Brighton. Second examination for the degree of Mus. Bac.—W. E. Chaplin, B.A., Keble College and Box Hill; W. E. Pitman, Keble College and Swanley; J. F. Shaw, jun., Queen's College and Upper Holloway; C. J. Wood, Queen's College and Wellingborough. For the degree of Mus. Doc.—H. Coward, Queen's College and Sheffield; A. S. Dale, Brasenose College and Oxton, Birkenhead; A. S. Holloway, Worcester College and Drayton Park; T. Hutchinson, New College and Sunderland; A. W. Wilson, B.A., Keble College and East Sheen; D. F. Wilson, New College and Ayr. The examiners were Professor Sir J. Stainer, Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry (Choragus), and Dr. P. Armes.

The prospectus of the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society announces three Subscription Concerts (tenth series) to be given at the Queen's Hall, on the 19th inst., February 19 and April 29, 1895. The programme for the first Concert will include:—Overture, "Die Meistersinger"; Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 5); Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture; Cradle Song for orchestra, G. H. Couldery: Elfentanz, Miss Clarisse Mallard (first time of performance); and March from Raff's "Lenore" Symphony. Among other works announced for performance during the season are: Schumann's Symphony in D (No. 1); German's music to "Henry VIII."; Zwei Sinfonische stücke for orchestra, H. A. Keyser (first time of performance); Overture, "Die Akademische," Brahms; Gade's Symphony (No. 2); Suite, "Jeux d'Enfants," Bizet; and an orchestral work by Dr. C. H. H. Parry. We are asked to correct an erroneous impression that the subscription list is confined to members of the Stock Exchange. The intention of the promoters is to attract the support of the musical public generally.

The South London Choral Association gave a Concert at the South London Institute of Music, on the 22nd ult. Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," Hamish MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter," and Eaton Faning's "Liberty" formed a selection which drew together a large audience; and both band and chorus more than sustained the well-deserved reputation they have acquired under Mr. L. C. Venables. The chorus, indeed, performed their arduous duties in really admirable style. The soloists were Madame Adelaide Mullen, Madame Eliza Thomas, Mr. Kelson Trueman, and Mr. FitzGibbon, who, at a day's notice, took the place of Mr. Herbert Thorndike; and his singing in Mendelssohn's work, to which he was previously a perfect stranger, reflected credit upon his vocal ability. Mr. Gatehouse was at his usual post as leader of the orchestra, and it may justly be said that the initial performance of the twenty-seventh season of the South London Choral Association was one of its very best. The "Rose of Sharon" will be the next work given by the Association.

The newly-formed Queen's Hall Choral Society gave its second Concert on the 8th ult., under the direction of Mr. William Carter, whose "Placida, or the Christian Martyr," occupied the first part of the programme, the second consisting of Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Neither work is of the kind that puts a choir on its mettle, and we are still without evidence, therefore, of the capability of this choral force to deal with works making large demands on the higher qualities of a choir. So far as its work went it was performed without giving serious cause for complaint, but also without distinction. The orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus, discharged an easy and familiar task easily and familiarly, and the soloists included such well-known and capable artists as Miss Damian and Messrs. Iver McKay and Foli, besides a new American soprano, Miss Nuola, who, being apparently in bad voice, must be heard again before an opinion of her merits can be safely formed. Mr. C. Constable and Mr. Crawshaw also gave vocal assistance.

A Song and Pianoforte Recital will be given at Princes' Hall, on the afternoon of the 13th inst., by Miss Wakefield, Mr. Walter Ford, and Mr. Isidor Cohn. The "Liederkreis," or Song Circle, which it is the special design of this programme to illustrate, forms an interesting and rarely heard portion of vocal music. It consists of a collection of lyrics now welded together by the poet, now by the composer, relating to the same object and forming one piece of music. Thus the distinctive feature of a "Liederkreis" is that it does not consist of a string of songs making a collection, but that it must in each instance contain short poems making one complete whole with the music. As an individual lyric must have but one subject, though many forms of treatment, so must a "Liederkreis." The first example, "An die Ferne Geliebte," has probably not been heard in London since Mr. Sims Reeves sang it at the Popular Concerts in 1863.

The Messrs. Hann had a large attendance at Brixton Hall, on October 29, for the commencement of their ninth season of Chamber Concerts. Haydn's String Quartet in C (Op. 76) and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), both given with precision and finished expression, were the principal pieces. Two solos for violoncello (Mr. Clement Hann), three pianoforte morceaux (Mr. Sidney H. Hann), and some songs contributed by Madame Hope Glenn helped to make up a capital programme. On the 19th ult. the instrumental works were Beethoven's String Quartet in C (No. 3, Op. 59), Grieg's Sonata in A minor (Op. 36) for pianoforte and violin (played by Messrs. Sidney and William C. Hann), Schubert's Trio in B flat (No. 1, Op. 99), and a couple of violin solos (Mr. Lewis Hann). Miss Greta Williams was the vocalist, and the hall was again crowded.

Mr. Frederick Griffith began his series of Flute Recitals at the Salle Erard, on the 9th ult., with M. Emile Sauret and Miss Llewela Davies as instrumental assistants. With these he played a Trio by Bach, and joined Miss Davies in an interesting Suite for pianoforte and flute by Widor. He also successfully gave a Romance by Emile Bernard and a Barcarolle and Scherzo by Lefebvre. The vocalists were Miss Marian Evans and Mr. Arthur Oswald, the latter selecting songs by Mr. E. German and Mdlle. Chaminade. At the second Concert, on the 16th ult., Mr. Griffith was associated with Miss Llewela Davies in two Suites by Mr. German, and an Introduction, Tema, and Variations by Schubert. He also took part, with Messrs. Frederiksen and Wilson, in two Nocturnes for flute, violin, and pianoforte, by Behr. Miss Mary Harris and Mr. Arthur Thompson supplied the vocal pieces.

The Wolff Musical Union gave its first Concert for the present season on the 22nd ult., at St. James's Hall, the programme being entirely made up of compositions by two French musicians, Mr. Gabriel Fauré and Mr. Francis Thomé, both composers taking effective part in the programme as pianists. The first-named was represented by a brilliantly-written Pianoforte Quartet in C minor, a Sonata for pianoforte and violin (in which some measure of individuality may be noted), and several songs, charmingly sung by Madame Jeanne Remacle, a young soprano. Mr. Thomé's contributions were some pretty pianoforte pieces of light calibre, two equally pleasing songs tastefully rendered by Madame Amy Sherwin, and accompaniment for pianoforte, violin, violoncello, and drum to Victor Hugo's ballad, "The Trumpeter's Betrothed," the poem of which was prettily recited by Miss Lily Hanbury.

Mr. Alfred J. Dye gave a successful Concert at Woodside Hall, North Finchley, on the 2nd ult., when he appeared in the capacity of composer and performer, both on the violin and pianoforte. New songs by the Concert-giver were sung by Miss Emily Davies ("Then and now"), Mr. Charles Phillips ("The King of the Night," which was encored), Mr. William Green ("Come back, dear love," also encored), and Miss Bessie Dore ("Love's good night"). Mr. Dye introduced a Canzonetta for violin, written by himself, and a Study by David, and also played Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 27, No. 2). Mr. Dye was further assisted by Miss Adelaide Arnold (harp), the Polymnia Quartet, and Mr. Woodthorpe Browne. A special feature of interest was the recitation, by Mr. Charles Fry, of "The Bells," with Mr. Stanley Hawley's music, in which he was accompanied by the composer.

The Clapham Philharmonic Concerts (sixth season) were resumed, under the direction of Mr. Walter Mackway, on the 8th ult., when a miscellaneous programme was given, including Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," and "Liberty" (a song of ancient Rome), by Eaton Faning. The vocalists were Miss Lily Seddon, Miss Gertrude Jackson, and Mr. Charles Copland, with Miss Kate Ould (violoncello) and Mr. Alfred Izard (pianoforte). On the 22nd ult. an interesting Lecture, "Reminiscences of Mendelssohn," was given by Mr. Walter Macfarren. There will be Concerts of Chamber Music on the 13th inst. and February 14, 1895; a Pianoforte Recital by Mr. Tobias Matthay on January 31; and the final Concert, on March 28, will include Handel's Coronation anthem, "The King shall rejoice," and "The Dream of Jubal" (Mackenzie).

Miss Emily Dones gave an attractive Concert in the Lecture Hall attached to Trinity Presbyterian Church, Clapham Road, on the 12th ult. A very interesting and varied programme was presented with the assistance of Mrs. Mary Davies, Madame Isabel George, Mr. Orlando Harley, Mr. Robert Hilton, Mr. Frederick Bevan, the Dilettante Vocal Quartet, Miss Mary Chatterton (harp), Mr. Ernest Meadows (violin), Mr. J. W. D. Brooks (pianoforte), and Mr. Charles Fry (reciter). Miss Dones contented herself with a single solo, Handel's "Lascia ch' io pianga," which she sang in her accustomed cultured style and with much success, and she joined Madame George in Blumenthal's duet, "Venetian Boat Song." The performance gave much satisfaction to a crowded audience.

The Royal Academy of Music Students' Concert, at St. James's Hall, on the 12th ult., had among its leading features Rheinberger's Mass in E flat (Op. 155) for female voices, given with organ accompaniment with excellent results. The new compositions by students included the Introduction and Allegro of a Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, a spirited work, by Miss Llewela Davies, interpreted by the composer, Miss Gertrude Collins, Messrs. Arthur Walenn and B. Patterson Parker; a graceful song, "Go, lovely rose," by Mr. Harold S. Moore (expressively rendered by Mr. Chambers Coleman); and a Romance and Bourrée for violin and pianoforte—slight pieces replete with elegance and fancy—by Mr. Christopher Wilson, who played them with Miss Gertrude Collins. Dr. Mackenzie conducted.

The Imperial Institute Amateur Orchestra resumed its performances on the 21st ult., when excellent renderings were given of Ambroise Thomas's charming Overture to "Mignon," and of the unfinished but undying B minor Symphony of Schubert. The orchestra also ably accompanied Miss Sybil Palliser, who gave a refined rendering of the pianoforte part of Grieg's characteristic Concerto in A minor, and won for itself much applause from a large audience by its spirited interpretation of the Minuet from Handel's "Berenice." An interesting feature of the evening was the successful début of Miss Helen E. Buckley, the possessor of a soprano voice of pleasing quality which has received excellent training. Mr. Randegger conducted.

The first of two Concerts by the string quartet party organised by Mr. Richard Gompertz took place in the Queen's (Small) Hall on the 14th ult. The programme was interesting, including as it did a Quartet in D (Op. 11) by Tschaikowsky, of which the thematic material is striking and in some instances beautiful; and a new Quartet in F, by Dvorák (Op. 96), in which some of the subjects are suggestive of American plantation ditties, cleverly treated. Mr. Gompertz's colleagues in the concerted works were Mr. Haydn Inwards, Mr. Emil Kreuz, and Mr. Charles Ould, the ensemble being excellent; and Mrs. Katharine Fisk was effective in songs by Brahms, Leoncavallo, and Schubert.

Mr. Fred. W. Holloway gave a very enjoyable Concert at Herne Hill on the 15th ult., when an interesting programme of classical music was performed. The instrumentalists, Miss A. M. Holloway (violin) and Miss L. M. Littlehales (violoncello), were warmly applauded for their excellent playing. Mr. J. H. Williams received a well merited encore for his rendering of an original song by Mr. Holloway. Three selections given by the Grecian Vocal Quartet also deserve much praise, their attack and intonation being especially good. Other artists were Madame Robiolio, Mr. Robert Poole, and Mr. F. W. Holloway, who is to be congratulated on the accuracy and expression displayed in his pianoforte playing.

Madame Isabel George and Miss Lucie Hillier brought into their programme, on the 2nd ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall, Emil Sjögren's Sonata in E minor (Op. 24) for pianoforte and violin, not previously given in this country. The work was sufficiently interesting, both in material and in development, to hold attention throughout, the Allegro and the Scherzo being specially bright and spontaneous in character. It was capitally played by Miss Hillier and M. Sauret. The first-named also gave a refined performance of Chopin's Fantaisie (Op. 49). Madame Isabel George's vocal talent was conspicuous in a careful rendering of Giordani's "Let not age."

Miss Olive Harcourt, at her Concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on October 26, displayed a soprano voice of exceptional compass and essayed several styles of composition with varying success. The piece most suited to her means was Jensen's "Murmelndes Lüftchen," the spirit of which was accurately caught. Mr. Henry Ward sang Handel's "Si tra i ceppi" effectively. Miss Kate Woolf and Mr. Mirko Belinski distinguished themselves by a neat performance of Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violoncello, and afterwards confirmed the good impression thus made by ably rendering solo pieces for their respective instruments.

The Smoking Concert given on the 22nd ult., in the Queen's Hall, by the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society, demands record as being the first of this description to which ladies have been invited. The new concession to the privileges of the fair sex was taken advantage of by so large a number of ladies, and the evening proved so successful, that the example will doubtless be followed by other societies. The hall, arranged in honour of the occasion with lofty palms and a profusion of ferns and flowers, presented a most charming appearance, and the entertainment provided was of a varied and light description.

The annual winter Concert by professional students of the London Academy of Music was held in St. George's Hall, on the 16th ult., when Mr. A. Pollitzer presided over a string orchestra to a large extent consisting of ladies. Ladoukhine's "Twilight" and Haydn's "Rondo All' Ongarese" were carefully rendered. Mr. Mervyn Dene exhibited some talent, both as pianoforte accompanist and as vocalist. Harold Samuel, quite a lad, gave a spirited version of Moszkowski's pianoforte "Caprice Espagnol." As regards the other performances, there were several instances of ambition having got the better of judgment.

An excellent performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given by the Denmark Place Choral Society (late Walworth Choral Society) on the 9th ult., in the Lecture Hall, Denmark Place, Camberwell. The soloists were Mdlle. Vagnolini, Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. Walter Hennings. Mr. W. E. Curtis conducted with his usual skill, and Mr. Frank Grant at the harmonium and Mr. Herbert Warrington at the pianoforte played the accompaniments efficiently.

On the 8th ult., at the Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, Lord Coleridge distributed the prizes and certificates to the successful candidates at the musical examinations of the London centre of Trinity College during the session 1893-4. The National Prize, value £5, given by the College, was won by E. Turner for harmony and counterpoint, whilst a number of silver and bronze medals for efficiency in various classes of musical education were awarded.

Miss Winifred Parker and Miss Rose Williams, at their Concert, on the 21st ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall, made a special feature of their duet singing. Their voices harmonised well, the tone being equally balanced, whilst with respect to minute details of light and shade there was abundant evidence of painstaking practice together. Mr. Norman Salmond, Mdlle. Marianne Eissler (violin), and the London Glee Singers also appeared.

A selection from the "Creation" was sung at Holy Trinity, Upper Tooting, on Sunday afternoon, the 11th ult., with orchestral accompaniment. The solos were sung by Master Gough, Messrs. D. Attwater and E. Bryant. Mr. Warren Tear presided at the organ, and Mr. Alfred Physick conducted.

The organ at Westminster Abbey has recently been renovated and enlarged. The present organ was originally built by Schreider and Jordan in 1730. Ten years ago it was practically rebuilt, and certain additions, mostly the gift of Mr. A. D. Clarke, a musical amateur, have now been made.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "The Messiah," on the 7th ult., at St. Chrysostom's Church, Peckham. The soloists were Miss Laura Procter, Miss Isabel Lucas, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Swabey Russell. Dr. Turpin presided at the organ.

OBITUARY.

We regret to announce the following deaths:—

Charles le Corbeillier, pianist and composer, whose works include songs without words, nocturnes, a quantity of dance music, as well as an opérette de salon, entitled "Une Entrevue," and a mass for three voices and organ. He died recently, aged seventy-three.

Luigi Maria Luzi, a professor of music and composer of an unsuccessful opera, "Verità e bugie," which was performed in 1858 at Naples, in which town he died recently, aged sixty-three.

Ottavio Bartolini, formerly an esteemed baritone singer, who some decades ago appeared at many of the foremost opera houses in Europe. After his retirement from the stage he became a teacher of his art. He died recently at Rome, aged seventy-three.

Joseph Arden, whose real name was Kohlweck, an operatic singer at the Town Theatre, Bremen, where he died on October 28, aged forty-four.

Luigi Chiostri, an excellent artist, formerly the viola of the famous Becker Florentine Quartet, afterwards the director of a Florentine Trio founded by him, and lately of another Quartet party, whose performances were highly successful. He died at Florence on October 24, aged forty-seven.

Carl Gerber, Concertmeister at the Mozarteum, Salzburg, where he died on October 9.

Franz Thoms, formerly, for nearly forty years, a singer at the Court opera, Munich, where he died on October 13.

Alfons Czibulka, a well-known Austrian military bandmaster, composer of several operettas, many dances, and the pretty and extremely popular "Stephanie" Gavotte, one of those pieces which catch the public taste at once and make the round of the whole civilised world in an endless number of possible and impossible "arrangements." He died at Vienna on October 27, aged fifty-two.

August Neumann, formerly a comic opera singer, and for a number of years, while engaged at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, a prime favourite of the Berlin public. He died at Sondershausen, aged seventy.

René de Récy, the talented musical critic of the Revue Bleue, and one of the best contributors to our excellent contemporary, Le Guide Musical.

Richard Kafka, formerly a singer at Kroll's and other Berlin theatres; on September 26, at Friedrichshagen, near Berlin, aged forty-seven.

Ferdinand Podhorski, formerly opera singer at Prague, and afterwards a teacher of singing in Vienna, in which town he died on September 24, aged fifty-eight.

Wilhelm Knaack, highly esteemed in Germany and Austria as an excellent comic opera singer, and for many years a member of the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, Berlin, and the Carl Theater, Vienna. He died in the latter town on October 29, aged sixty-five.

Alexander Deckner, a musician best known through being the father of the violin virtuoso, Fräulein Charlotte Deckner, who died a few years ago. He died at Lugos, on October 24, aged seventy-four.

Josef Kurriz, a Hungarian musician, who went to America about ten years ago, died by his own hand at New York on October 27.

Roland Vincent Misquith, formerly a member of the well-known Indian firm of musicsellers, Messrs. Misquith and Co., of Madras, and for many years organist and choirmaster of Holy Trinity Church, Bangalore, in which town he managed a branch of his firm. He died suddenly on October 28 at Singapore, whither he had gone early in the year to establish a music business.

Rosina Penco, who in the forties and fifties enjoyed a great and well-deserved reputation as a charming and sympathetic singer, her artistic performances and statuesque beauty having been greatly admired by Parisians as well as the opera-goers of many other large towns, including London. She died recently at the Italian watering-place, Porretta, aged sixty-four, or—according to some papers, seventy-one.

By the premature death, in his thirty-sixth year, of Mr. Eugène Oudin, who was struck down by apoplexy in the artists' room at Queen's Hall, after the Richter Concert, on October 20, and died on the morning of Sunday, the 4th ult., the musical world is deprived of an artist of rare accomplishments, in the plenitude of his powers and the height of his well-earned popularity. Eugène Oudin, who was of French-Canadian extraction, but settled in the United States, was a graduate of Yale University, and practised for a while at the American bar. The late Frederick Clay, amongst others, recognised his musical talents, and encouraged him to cultivate them; and about the middle of the eighties Mr. Oudin deserted law for light opera. It was an uphill fight at first, and on the occasion of his first visit to England he failed to gain a satisfactory hearing. Later on, however, his talents as a romantic baritone singer asserted themselves so convincingly that Sir Arthur Sullivan decided to entrust him with the important rôle of the Templar in the production of "Ivanhoe," at the Royal English Opera House, in 1891. His impersonation of this part, both vocally and histrionically, was quite the feature of the production, and from that date onwards he was constantly in evidence on the stage and Concert platforms. Thus he created the part of Eugene Onegin in Tschaikowsky's opera of that name, when it was given for the first time in England, during one of Signor Lago's ill-fated seasons at the New Olympic; and did all that could be done for "Ma mie Rosette," when that piece was produced at the Shaftesbury Theatre. Within the last year he fulfilled an operatic engagement with conspicuous success at St. Petersburg, appearing along with M. van Dyck in "Werther," besides singing at several Concerts in Russia. In England he was in constant request at all the best Concerts, being an admirable linguist, a quick study, and a most sympathetic and refined interpreter of romantic and sentimental music. His voice—a high baritone—was exceedingly flexible, of a singularly emotional timbre, and his intonation was invariably perfect. He especially excelled in modern French music, and gave proof of his versatility by executing with great taste and facility the English versions of the numerous foreign songs in his extensive repertory. Personally he was extremely popular, being a man of winning manners, a most genial companion, and in point of general education far above the level of his fellows. His last public appearance was at the Birmingham Festival, where his exquisite singing in Schumann's "Faust" extorted unanimous eulogy. It is worthy of note that his sudden breakdown was, in all probability, due to the self-sacrificing devotion with which he nursed a sick friend who was taken ill and died at his house. Mr. Oudin leaves a widow—herself an excellent singer—and three young children.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GREEK MUSICAL NOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I am greatly obliged to you for allowing me to deal with Mr. Bergholt's letter here.

He writes as follows:—"I meant my Aristoxenean intervals to be Mr. Torr's, as I understood him to explain them on p. 627 (September)." On p. 627 I said that "the octave gave ten semitones of half a major tone apiece, and two of very nearly half a minor tone apiece." He thereupon set out a series of intervals which would make the octave give two semitones of half a major tone apiece, and ten of very nearly half a mean tone apiece. Such mistakes are inexcusable in any case; but particularly so when they are made the basis for a vehement attack.

He adds that my view, as he now understands it, "simply reproduces the Pythagorean (di-tonic) tuning, and so makes the rival sects identical—a palpable absurdity." But this would not make the rival sects identical. Aristoxenus did not quarrel with the Pythagoræans about the magnitude of the intervals in this scale of theirs. The quarrel was about the method of determining the intervals, Aristoxenus saying that this could be done accurately enough by ear, while the Pythagoræans said that it was necessary to measure off the lengths of string.

Mr. Bergholt is obscuring the issue by quoting Bellermann and Westphal. The question is about the views of Aristoxenus; and this must be decided by the statements of Aristoxenus himself. He can state his own views better than Bellermann or Westphal can state them for him; and in the passage that I quoted (pp. 45, 46) he puts the matter in a way that leaves no room for doubt.

With regard to the passage in Ptolemy, ii. 11, Mr. Bergholt complains that I have assumed that he was referring to the names by "position" when he really was referring to the names by "power." I regret the mistake; but he did not say which names he meant, and I took it for granted that he meant the names by "position." These would appear to be the customary names, since Ptolemy gives them in the regular order from proslambanomenos to nete hyperbolæon for the fifteen notes of every scale.

As for the names by "power," I imagine that they are simply the names of the notes of corresponding pitch in the Dorian scale, which is taken as a scale of reference; just as A might be called the sixth note by "power," if C major were taken as a scale of reference, though A would be the fifth note by "position" in D major, the fourth note by "position" in E major, and so on. Hence the names by "power" will only indicate a single scale, and not a set of scales of different pitch.

With regard to the passage in Ptolemy, ii. 15, Mr. Bergholt says that Ptolemy "mixes the chromatic and diatonic by taking one whole tetrachord from each." His italics would lead the reader to suppose that there was a transfer of four notes from one scale to the other. But three of the four notes were the same in the diatonic and chromatic tetrachords, so there was only a transfer of a single note.

He then says that "Mr. Torr confuses Ptolemy's method of mixture with another quite different method, whereby the two genera are combined in the same tetrachord." There was no confusion of the methods. My argument was a fortiori.

Ptolemy only introduces one chromatic note into the diatonic octave by taking a tetrachord from the chromatic scale, since the other three notes of the tetrachord were also diatonic. Aristoxenus introduces two chromatic notes into the diatonic octave, for he inserts a chromatic note in each of the two tetrachords. Now, if a diatonic scale could admit two chromatic notes in an octave, without ceasing to be diatonic, then, a fortiori, a diatonic scale could admit one chromatic note in an octave without ceasing to be diatonic.

Mr. Bergholt then writes as follows:—"How Boethius, in Mr. Torr's opinion, ought to have divided his string is irrelevant." But I conceive that if an argument is going to be founded on the figures in Boethius, it cannot be irrelevant to inquire whether they are right. On the strength of these figures Mr. Bergholt asserts that Boethius divided the string in a particular way, and then proceeds: "This is my point: by conceding this (as Mr. Torr is forced to do) he entirely contradicts his previous assertions." This statement is altogether without foundation. I pointed out quite plainly that the passage in Boethius has nothing to do with the case.

After this, Mr. Bergholt says:—"To establish the accuracy of my reading of Aristides as against Mr. Torr's, I need only refer to the fac-simile codices published by Bellermann and Albert Jahn, and to their critical remarks thereon." I presume that he refers to Bellermann's "Tonleitern und Musiknoten der Griechen," pp. 69 ff. and plate 6, and Albert Jahn's edition of Aristides, pp. 17, 18, and plate 1.

The fac-simile codices, which are published there, show that the equivalents of C flat and F flat are omitted, exactly as I said. In printing the passage Bellermann has added these notes in two lines by themselves, 3 and 6. Of line 3 he says, "dass diese allerdings in den Handschriften ganz fehlende Zeile ursprünglich vorhanden gewesen ist, zeigt die ihr entsprechende sechste Zeile, aus der zwar his verschwunden ist, die Notenpaare von eis′ und eis″ aber sich noch, ganz an die folgenden Textworte gedrängt, finden. Aus dem tieferen $\delta\pi$ ist $\lambda\pi$ geworden, und das höhere $\delta\pi$ ist in $\delta\zeta$ entstellt." In short, he admits that line 3 does not exist. He inserts it to match line 6; and then he admits that line 6 does not exist. He says that two of its three notes may be discovered in the text below; and then he admits that the notes which he fancies he discovers in the text are not the notes which he has printed in the line. Those are Bellermann's "critical remarks." Jahn makes no remarks at all, critical or otherwise; but just refers the reader to Bellermann.

Again, the fac-simile codices give the statement about the letters of Pythagoras exactly as I quoted it. Bellermann admits that it must, as I said, refer to the fourth list: "Und würde also die Ankundigung der vierten und letzten Notentafel gewesen sein." Jahn refers to Bellermann.

Finally, the fac-simile codices and all the editions agree that the second list gives these letters, as I said, in the order of their pitch as notes, and not in alphabetical order, as stated by Mr. Bergholt.

When he asserted that "the date of Alypius is A.D. 360 or later," I pointed out that this date could only be obtained by identifying our Alypius with another Alypius who lived about that time. He now writes as follows: "For my date of Alypius I gave proper references." His references were to Smith and Pauly (see p. 696, October). But, according to Smith, "there are no tolerably sure grounds for identifying him (Alypius) with any one of the various persons who bore the name in the times of the later emperors, and of whose history anything is known." And, according to Pauly, "einen von diesen für identisch mit dem Musiker zu halten fehlt es an ausreichendem Grund."

—Yours, &c.,

Cecil Torr.

[At Mr. Torr's special request we have consented to the insertion of a final letter on the subject of "Greek Musical Notation," but as it appears that the arguments pro and con might be continued ad infinitum, we have asked Mr. Bergholt, without impairing his views of the subject, to waive his right of rejoinder to the above letter, and we must now positively bring this discussion to a close, at least, as far as our columns are concerned.—Ed., M.T.]

THE UNIT-NOTE IN ANCIENT AND IN MODERN MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—You are good enough to refer in flattering terms to the transcript of the "Fitzwilliam Virginal Book," for which I am partly responsible. Allow me to correct you in one small particular. It is not strictly the case that Mr. Barclay Squire and I have left the notes exactly as they stand "in the original," for, not to speak of the correction of passages where the MS. is obviously corrupt, it has been thought advisable to alter the scribe's mode of expression in a few respects, so as to bring his meaning within the comprehension of modern musicians. His notation of passages in which groups of triplets, sextolets, or more extended examples of measures foreign to the main measure of the movement occur, differs from ours in some ways that are at first rather puzzling. For example, he expresses a triplet, not in terms of the same denomination as the two against which they are played, but in terms of a lower, so that if three equal notes are to be played simultaneously with two crotchets, these three appear not as crotchets, but as quavers, generally, but not always, with some equivalent of our figure 3 with a slur. Again, the writer uses groups of what a modern musician would call demisemiquavers to express what now-a-days would be written as sextolets of semiquavers; and, by an odd incongruity, the eight notes which are normally equivalent to four semiquavers are written as what we call semi-demisemiquavers—i.e., with four transverse strokes. In more extended passages of triple against duple or quadruple time, he revives the "black semibreve" and "black minim" of a former generation, creating a most awkward confusion—as it must always have been—between the black minim and the normal crotchet, written exactly identically. Here, too, he diverges from traditional usage, for his black semibreve is not two-thirds of a semibreve, but two-thirds of a minim, so that opposite a pair of minims will sometimes appear two black semibreves and two black minims. But it is perfectly true that in the main the text has been left as it stands, and even the bars, which in the early years of the seventeenth century were used with very imperfect understanding of their functions, have been kept in their places.

My object in writing to you is not however to trouble you with details of notation which, after all, find their proper place in the preface to the complete book, but to put before you some of the reasons which make it impossible for me to agree with your defence of the practice of reducing old music, in modern transcriptions, to notes of half the original value. These reasons are based partly on scientific and partly on practical considerations, and from your own words I take it that I shall not encounter on the former score any serious opposition from you. In the case of any historical document it is of no slight importance to present the actual orthography as well as the text, at least where antiquaries or historians are mainly to be considered, and if it were a question of none but musical antiquaries, there would be no doubt of the expediency of leaving the music exactly as it stands in all cases, even where some process of translation is necessary for the student before the spirit of the music can be evoked. You particularly emphasise the practical aspect of the question, arguing that for the sake of those who find it difficult to read old music as it stands, it should be altered into something which amateurs and the less cultivated professors can readily grasp. This seems a strong argument, until we reflect that the number of persons to whom music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries appeals is really very small, and that there is at least a probability that all who have begun to care for it will have enough perseverance to master the very few points in notation that are now strange to them. In all things connected with art, and in many others, we are at present under the iron heel of the "young person," and that which is too recondite for the schoolroom level of musical training must, it would seem, be withheld from the more highly educated. I would, therefore, plead the cause of these last with the utmost diffidence, for I quite know how unpopular it is. And I am not so quixotic as to anticipate the publication, in the present day, of music in which the page bristles with "longs" and "larges," and in which the breve is the unit of measurement. I would only ask for a retention of the text in cases where, though the unit of measurement may be a minim, the longest note of usual occurrence shall be a semibreve, with an occasional breve in such out-of-the-way places as the final chord. The barbarous compromise of adding below the score of vocal compositions printed according to the original an accompaniment written in notes of reduced value seems to me entirely unworthy of the professed aims of the learned Society that has adopted it.

In a sense, no doubt, and provided that due care be taken to indicate that the note values have been altered, and to guard against possible misunderstandings in the matter of pace, there will be little difference in effect between a composition in which longs and breves alternate, and the same thing reduced to semi-demisemiquavers and demi-semi-demisemiquavers, if any editor of the twentieth century should take a fancy for notes of this value, provided only that he will add such directions as shall prevent the music being sung at a preposterous rate of speed. But there is beyond question a tendency—possibly unconfessed—to attach to the crotchet, for example, a definite as well as a relative value. You allude to the modern practice adopted in some hymn books of printing tunes that used to consist of minims in crotchets; and I submit that this very thing has much to answer for in the unconscious encouragement of a style of ecclesiastical singing that threatens not only to obscure the solemnity of the old tunes, and to conceal the poverty of many of the new—the latter a most desirable object, I own—but to turn the Church service into a series of exciting races between organ, choir, and congregation. I do not think this sense of a definite value of notes is a new thing, or one to be lightly passed by. Who does not feel that a certain combination of solidity with rapidity results, at least in part, in the conventional fugues of the masses of the eighteenth century, from the employment of semibreves against groups of four crotchets, which would be lost or lessened by translation into minims and quavers? If the Credo of Bach's B minor Mass may be taken as the typical instance of this, let me contrast with it such movements as the first of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 22), or the Arietta of Op. 111. Is there not a feeling of a quality that may almost be called "light" in these movements, notwithstanding the extreme slowness of the latter, which would not be realised as fully in longer notes played twice as fast? I know I am here on disputable, not to say dangerous ground, for the feeling for such refinements as this is somewhat exceptional, like a sense of the colour of the various keys. I should like to point out that in the examples I have quoted the crotchet is never the unit of measurement. If this feeling for an absolute or quasi-absolute value of notes be in any sense a real thing, may we not suspect that we shall be on the safer side in preserving intact all such musical texts as are not absolutely unintelligible to modern musicians? With apologies for so largely trespassing on your space,—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

J. A. Fuller Maitland.

[Mr. Fuller Maitland discusses the interesting points at issue so temperately and fairly that we cannot but regret our inability to adopt his view of the expediency of reprinting old music in old time-values. We hold, as he does, that musicians are greatly influenced by the appearance of the written or printed notes. And we say that as to the old musicians, the semibreve and minim represented what, speaking generally, the minim and crotchet do to the players of to-day, the retention of the old time-values would have the effect of inducing them to perform the old music much more slowly than it should be played or was played in the days when it was written. That the note regarded as the unit has changed in process of time is certain. So far back as 1636 Butler complains of the fact in his "Principles of Musik" (p. 28): "As in former time, when the Semibrief and Minim were the least notes, the Brief was the measure-note, or principal Time-Note . . . so since the inventing of the smaller notes (the Brief growing by little and little out of use) the Semibrief became measure-note in his stead: as now in quick time the Minim beginneth to encroach uppon the Semibrief." That was 258 years ago, when, be it observed, the shortest existing note was a semiquaver. The process here described has been going steadily on until, as Mr. Maitland points out, we have begun to use the quaver as the unit in pieces intended to be played with a certain lightness. The music of Radino is assuredly "light" music—"drawing-room music" we should call it to-day, probably—and should therefore be so printed as to suggest lightness, which semibreves and minims would certainly not do. Whether old music (instrumental especially) should or should not be played more sedately than that of the present day is another question. We think it should, for this is a feverish age; but the difference would not amount to anything like a doubling of time-value.—Ed., M.T.]

THE ORCHESTRA IN MUSIC HALLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Public attention has recently been called to the music halls of the metropolis, and perhaps it would be a favourable opportunity for appealing to caterers for public amusement to supply us with a music hall proper, where really first class music would be performed. Far be it from me to criticise the management, &c., of our "Varieties Theatres," for the programme supplied evidently suits the audience; but the vocal performances are not, perhaps, suited to anyone suffering from musical sensitiveness, and the orchestral performances are "nil." Therefore it is my humble opinion that in our midst should be a large hall or theatre where a full orchestra and one or two vocalists perform the works of the masters while smoking, &c., are allowed in all parts of the building; something, in fact, like the Promenade Concerts, with a little more license as regards refreshment. The London County Council would surely not object to such a place. All that is wanted is a chance to hear, say, the "Ride of the Valkyries" to the accompaniment of a brandy and soda and a cigar. Surely all such as call themselves musicians—amateur or professional—will use their influence towards the introduction of such a place of amusement, where an orchestra can be heard for a small sum, while the pipe and glass contribute much to the creature comfort of the audience and intensify their powers of intellectual enjoyment.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

An Orchestral Amateur.

H. H. PIERSON'S "FAUST."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I should not have troubled you further on the subject of Pierson's incidental music to the second part of Goethe's "Faust," but that Mr. Corder recently challenged the correctness of my statement that this music is constantly performed in Germany.

I did not speak at random.

I have ascertained from one in intimate association with the Capellmeister of the Royal Theatre of Dresden, that during the fourteen years, 1880-94, "Faust" (Part 2) has been performed there over sixty times always with Pierson's music and no other. This gives an average of more than four performances in each of those fourteen years.

Now, it must be remembered that the performances at the Dresden Theatre alternate between opera and drama; that a great work like "Faust" (Part 2) involves elaborate scenery which upsets other arrangements, and that the Germans are not in the habit of repeating a play of large calibre week after week as in England. I conceive, therefore, that I am perfectly justified in regarding a performance of Pierson's music four times at least in each of those fourteen years as a constant performance of that music.

You will greatly oblige me by inserting these few lines in your next issue.—Yours faithfully,

Theodore S. Hill.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Aberdeen.—The students of the Aberdeen Music School, numbering about eighty performers, gave a successful Concert, in the Royal Albert Hall, on the 1st ult. The ensemble pianoforte work was highly effective and the part-songs were well balanced and tastefully sung. The Concert was under the direction of Miss Hensman.

Bicester.—The opening meeting, on the 6th ult., of the Musical Society, in St. Edburg's Hall, was largely attended. Mr. H. J. Vaughan conducted, and the pieces selected included "Blessed be the day," Handel; "O sing to God," Gounod; "Christmas," Macfarren; and "The Urchin's Dance," Hatton.

Bolton.—The Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first open rehearsal on the 14th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Morris. Interesting features of the evening were the clever violin playing of Miss J. D. Morris—a young player of much promise—and the clarinet solos of Mr. G. A. Hoffman. The enjoyment of the evening was further increased by the singing of Miss Evangeline Florence.

Brighton.—Mr. E. H. Thorne, assisted by his pupils, Miss Beatrice Thorne and Mr. C. Ewart Gravely, gave an attractive Pianoforte Recital, on October 31, in the Music Room at the Royal Pavilion. Mr. Thorne's abilities were favourably shown in Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata, and those of Miss Thorne in four short pieces by Stojowski. Rubinstein's latest contribution to the pianoforte—viz., "Souvenir de Dresde" (Op. 118), also elicited much applause. Mr. Gravely greatly pleased by his Chopin playing, and ably assisted Mr. Thorne in Algernon Ashton's effective "Three Scotch Dances," which concluded the Recital. —— On October 27 Mr. Charles Fry gave a successful Recital of "Hamlet," at the Pavilion, with Berthold Tours's Incidental Music played by an orchestra under the direction of Dr. F. J. Sawyer.

Bury St. Edmunds.—A successful Concert was given in the Athenæum, on the 6th ult., in aid of the Choir Fund of St. Mary's Church, in the presence of a large audience. Miss Comber's Ladies' Band was en evidence. Miss Winnie Collen played a violin solo in good style, and songs, trios, and part-songs were contributed by Miss Dolly Shillitoe, Miss Spooner, Master Jackson, Messrs. R. E. Bascombe, R. N. Barwell, A. C. Remnant, Houghton, Day, White, Catchpole, and the church choir.

Calverley.—Sir Joseph Barnby's sacred cantata "Rebekah" was well sung at Mr. Child's annual Concert, by the Kirkgate Wesleyan Chapel Choir, with Miss Isabel Miller, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. Dan Billington as soloists. Mr. R. V. Rushworth acted as accompanist.

Cardiff.—The opening evening of the University College Chamber Concerts passed off most successfully, as it could scarcely fail to do from the instrumentalists engaged—viz., Miss Gabriella Wietrowetz, Miss Marian Bateman, and Mr. W. Squire. Miss L. Stadelmann was the vocalist, and Mr. J. E. Deacon the accompanist. The programme included Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G, and Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in D minor.

Chichester.—The Musical Society gave a Chamber Concert on the 6th ult., when trios by Beethoven and Gade were admirably performed by Mr. J. Sutcliffe, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, and Dr. F. J. Read; and vocal solos effectively sung by Miss Ena Bedford.

Cirencester.—A successful Concert was given in the Corn Hall on the 15th ult., by the Cirencester Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. A. H. Gibbons. The programme included the Overture to the "Men of Prometheus" (Beethoven); Andante from Fourth Symphony (Mendelssohn); Symphony, "La Reine" (Haydn); Gavotte, "Yellow Jasmine," from "Language of Flowers" Suite (Cowen), &c. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse acted as solo violinist and leader and Mr. Clement Hann as solo violoncellist. The former played De Bériot's Concerto in D and Aria and Gavotte from Suite (Vieuxtemps), and the latter Romance (Fischer) and Dance Hollandaise (Dunkler), all of which were enthusiastically received. Miss B. J. Martyn sang in a very artistic manner.

Dundee.—The Dundee Amateur Choral Union has decided to give, at its spring Concert, a performance of Dr. Sawyer's "Orpheus." A special interest is attached to this work, in so far as it gained, in 1893, the prize of £100 offered by Messrs. Methven, Simpson and Co., for the best cantata by a British-born subject.

Froome-Selwood.—Mr. Alfred H. Allen, assisted by the choir, gave two Organ Recitals, on the 15th ult., in the Parish Church. Mr. Allen's programmes presented excellent selections of organ music. The choir sang an excerpt from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Elvey's anthem "I beheld, and lo, a great multitude."

Hull.—An attractive Chamber Concert was given by the Misses Hester Sloman, Alice M. Antenbring, and Jennie Langford, on the 7th ult., in the old Town Hall. The two first-named performers took part in Grieg's Sonata in F (Op. 8) for pianoforte and violin, as well as playing several solos on their respective instruments; and Miss Langford sang an excellent selection of songs.

Luton.—The annual Choir Festival of Chapel Street Wesleyan Church took place on the 11th ult., when a selection from Gaul's "Holy City," Handel's "Samson," and other works was excellently rendered by the large and well-trained choir, numbering 150 members. Mr. Sidney Bennett conducted, and Mr. G. Underwood was at the fine new organ recently built by Messrs. Hill and Sons.

Plymouth.—A successful Recital of classical music was given by Miss C. H. Robinson, at Mutley, on October 27. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 2, No. 2), two numbers from Grieg's Op. 3, Henselt's "Danklied Nach Sturm," Mendelssohn's "Bees' Wedding," the Adagio from Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, songs by Purcell, Goring Thomas, and Brahms, and the fine Duet (Op. 8) by Grieg for violin and pianoforte. The executants were Miss Blanche Lewin (vocalist), Mr. R. V. Ball (violin), and Miss C. H. Robinson (pianoforte).

Rawtenstall.—On the occasion of the presentation of the League Cup to the champions of the Lancashire Cricket League, on the 3rd ult., a Concert was given in the Town Hall, at which much appreciated assistance was rendered by Miss B. Holt, Miss A. Roscoe, Mr. W. Arnold, and Mr. C. F. Critchley, to whom Mr. J. E. W. Banks acted as accompanist.

Reading.—An Orchestral Concert, conducted by Dr. Read, was given, under the auspices of the Orpheus Society, on the 13th ult. A band of thirty instrumentalists, led by Mr. A. Burnett, played a Haydn Symphony, the Overtures to "Egmont" and "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite; and vocal solos were charmingly sung by Miss Una Bruckshaw.

Sunderland.—A successful Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in the Grange Congregational Church, on October 24. The choir, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Smith, gave an excellent rendering of Wesley's "Wilderness"; and the solos, "But the Lord is mindful" and "Be thou faithful unto death" ("St. Paul"), were sung during the service by Miss Wainwright and Mr. T. T. Snowball respectively.

Waterford.—The new organ recently erected in the Dominican Church, by Messrs. P. Conacher and Co., was opened, on the 4th ult., by a special Service, when the music of the Mass was specially selected for the occasion—the Kyrie, Credo, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei from Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," the Sanctus and Gloria by Silas, and the Inflammatus from Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Mrs. Marlowe presided with skill at the organ.

Wetton.—The Wayland Choral Society has commenced its winter season by putting Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" into rehearsal, with Mr. W. Owen-Jones, of King's Lynn, as Conductor.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. W. A. Macduff, Organist and Choirmaster to Warwick Parish Church.—Mr. Ashton J. Lawrence, to St. Lawrence Church, Winchester.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Thomas Powell (Principal Alto), to Lincoln's Inn Chapel.—Mr. W. Windsor (Alto), to Lincoln's Inn Chapel.

MR. TOM BURGIN

(The Australian popular Baritone)

Having returned to England after a long and successful career, is now booking Engagements for Miscellaneous and Oratorio Concerts.

"Mr. Tom Burgin, who sang Ciro Pinsuti's 'I fear no foe,' is one of the finest baritones ever heard in this city. His voice is full and perfectly under command, and the way in which he rang out the defiant tones of his song last night was something to be remembered."—Melbourne Argus.

"In the soul-stirring song, 'The Bay of Biscay,' he was most vociferously encored, and, in spite of two recalls, he was compelled to repeat the last verse, which gave unlimited satisfaction to the audience."—Sydney Morning Herald.

"Mr. T. Burgin has in his voice and manner the conditions of success, and only needs to be known to be appreciated in this wider artistically, but, geographically narrower, tight little island. His songs were well chosen to display his varied powers, his first appearance being made in an Australian song, 'Imperfectus,' by Sir W. C. F. Robinson, Governor of Western Australia. This proved a most interesting composition and was enthusiastically received."—Northern Echo.

"In Mr. T. Burgin Mons. Speelman has found a really splendid baritone, and Mons. Speelman was so delighted with Mr. Burgin's singing that he shook hands with him on the stage in a complimentary manner. Mr. Burgin has met with all the success he merited, and his next appearance will be anxiously awaited for."—Blackpool Times.

LATEST PRESS NOTICE.

"The Westminster Singers, who visited Plymouth for the first time yesterday, were the great attraction for Part II. Whatever may have been anticipated of them, those expectations must have been more than exceeded in the results. It is a quartet perfect in everything. The most rigorous detective for a flaw in their singing must have been baffled. The harmony of their combination was exquisite. No known instrument could have excelled it in beauty and exactness. The same careful taste apparent in the more serious compositions they rendered, was imparted into the humorous stories which they sang. In every case they were encored. Their reception was one of the utmost enthusiasm."—Western Morning News, Nov. 22.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

* UNA

4th and 5th Thousand.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

† THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Seventh and Eighth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

5th and 6th Thousand.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

VOICE-TRAINING STUDIES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

BY EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"This work contains 24 Progressive Studies in different styles, and is intended as a companion or supplementary volume to 'Voice-Training Exercises.' Those of a more cantabile character are to be used as Solfeggi, the others are to be sung as Vocalises. In this Second Edition the accompaniments have been simplified. Highly favourable opinions of these Studies have been expressed by Sir John Stainer, Sir Robert Stewart, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and other eminent authorities."

"There can be little doubt that these 'Studies,' which are published in separate keys for all voices, will share the popularity of the 'Exercises.'"—Sunday Times.
"We have no doubt that the second volume will equal the first in popularity."—Morning Post.
"I am glad to find you are still going ahead in your valuable sphere of work. The 'Voice-Training Studies' are a solid and sound contribution to the repertory of teachers and students."—Sir John Stainer.
"Your new book of 'Voice-Training Studies' is admirable, and will prove of very great value to students and teachers. I like it much."—C. Vincent, Mus. Doc.

Bear they that tree ?
He who first carries it,
Who is He ?

THE AMATEURS OF LONDON.

IT is satisfactory to those who desire and have laboured for the general diffusion of a taste for music amongst all classes of the community, to observe the sure results of what has been doing for the last few years.

Some twenty years since, the execution of concerted and choral music in private was almost unknown; indeed it then required more than ordinary industry to organise such a performance. The libraries of the few, who possessed classical works then only in MS. had to be visited, much diligence used in multiplying sufficiently the copies, and then the small number of performers who could be got together, although "willing," were far from "able to take a part." Some zealous individuals, about the time mentioned, formed themselves into a society called the "Classical Harmonists," and such was the existing scarcity of able amateurs, that for several years their limited number of some twenty members, "willing and able to take a part," remained incomplete.

This society was the parent of many other associations, having for their object the performance of somewhat similar music; and the influence of this constant private performance of the highest classical works, and the production of good printed copies, on the taste and practical ability of the amateurs of London, that we find in 1834 that there was designed and effectively carried into execution, the Amateur Festival—a meeting which was highly creditable to all engaged, and was very beneficial to the excellent charity to which the surplus funds were dedicated. The taste for this rational and delightful manner of passing the evening, has so much increased since 1834, that the many important societies existing in London are more in number than the individual members required for the formation of the parent society, besides the numerous friendly meetings where the young people of neighbouring families join for the execution of concerted music.

With this growing feeling, it is not surprising, that when a few years ago, Mr. Mainzer, Mr. Hullah, and others, proposed to teach the rudiments of singing to large classes at a small individual cost, that great numbers should have been found willing to avail themselves of their assistance, and that their schools should have been crowded. It is to be regretted that the foes, and still more injudicious friends, should have done some damage to these systems, which pretended to teach no more than the rudiments, by ascribing results to them which they never proposed to achieve. The retirement from the classes of these self-deceived persons has given an appearance of falling off in the interest of these schools not warranted by fact. There is this comfort for the doubters, and answer to the sneerers, who are dissatisfied with the slow advance, that the aggregate of all the efforts made in the last twenty years, has created a body of amateurs in London capable of doing much themselves, and giving them a high appreciation of exalted talent in professors, and affording abundant promise of great future advancement for the cause of good music.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A VERY important contribution to the cause of good music has been made by the publication of several numbers of a series of "Cheap Classics." They are printed in vocal score with a separate accompaniment for the organ or pianoforte; great pains having been taken with the engraving and printing, so that they are emphatically "cheap" both in quantity and quality. For instance, Spohr's great oratorio of "The Last Judgment," is complete for 7*s.* 6*d.*; Mozart's Masses at 2*s.* 6*d.* and 3*s.* 6*d.* each; and Haydn's Masses from 4*s.* to 6*s.*

It is probable that this experiment to give the public music at a cheaper rate than usual, will be attended with better success than has hitherto been the case; because former reprints have usually consisted of non-copyright works already to be found in a great variety of shapes. But the present series consists of standard and much-sought-after works, only previously to be obtained at a high price

The last month has also produced the concluding numbers of Boyce's collection of Cathedral Music printed in separate Vocal Parts. Choral Societies can now perform some of the services produced by the great English Cathedral writers, which previously to the present publication were sealed books. It will doubtless be one means of that great improvement so much to be desired, in the Cathedral and Church Service, as a very extensive choir can be supplied with sufficient copies at a trifling cost.

It is intended, that the valuable collection of cathedral music made by Dr. Arnold, be immediately published in the same manner in separate vocal parts.

It would surely be found, that in many parishes, a sufficient number of persons having voices, might be found, who, with proper instruction from their organist, and regular preliminary practice, might relieve the parochial service from the horrid infliction of the charity children's present mode of singing. At all events, one of the difficulties to the effective performance of the church service has been removed by these publications in separate vocal parts.

FELIX MENDELLSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

THE greatest event of this almost unprecedentedly brilliant season is, undoubtedly, the arrival of Dr. Mendelssohn. At the last Philharmonic Concert the effect of his presence manifested itself in two ways. The densely crowded state of the room, and the admirable manner in which the orchestra performed its important part in the concert, were alike attributable to Dr. Mendelssohn. If the directors for 1844 had effected nothing else than the engagement of that great musician, they would still be entitled to the gratitude of the subscribers, for having done the wisest thing that has ever been done since the society came into existence.—Musical World.

BRIEF CHRONICLE OF THE LAST MONTH.

MADAME ANNA THILLON made a highly successful debut before an English audience at the Princess's theatre, on the 2nd, in Auber's opera "Les Diamans de la Couronne."

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF FEMALE MUSICIANS gave their annual concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on the 3rd. The first part consisted of selections from the Creation, and Beethoven's Mass in C, with an effective chorus of one hundred voices The object of this institution is to make a fund for the relief of its indigent members. Several first-rate professors lent their aid, most of the female portion of whom are members of this excellent society.

ABBEY GLEE CLUB.—A prize of ten guineas, offered by William Dixon, Esq., for the best madrigal, was awarded to Mr. James Coward. There were two other candidates, whose productions were greatly admired.

THE MESSIAH.—This great work of the immortal Handel was written in twenty-one days; it was commenced on the 22nd of August, 1741; its three parts being the work respectively of six, nine, and six days; and the last page of the original score intimates that it was finished on the 12th of September. The original was presented by Handel to the Foundling Hospital, where it has since remained, and where it is highly valued.—Dramatic and Musical Review

ENCORES.—The York Choral Society gave a concert to a very numerous audience. The first part was Handel's Acis and Galatea; it passed off well and gave great satisfaction. The second part was a miscellaneous collection, which was not all performed, from the following circumstance:—the second song was Handel's "Sweet Bird," which elicited such immense applause, that the performers could not proceed with the next piece, and it being a standing rule with the committee to allow no encores, the concert broke up.—From a Correspondent of the Musical Examiner

MADAME HASSELT BARTH (a German singer of some celebrity), has recently erected at her own expense a monument over the too long neglected grave of MOZART. It is a tablet of gray marble, surmounted by a medallion head of the great composer. It bears an inscription briefly characteristic of the talent of Mozart. "Jung, gross, spat erkannt, nie erreicht." ("Young, great, late acknowledged, never equalled.") —Foreign Quarterly Review.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—This society met to award the prize of ten guineas given by — Evans, Esq., for the best madrigal in imitation of the ancient masters. It will be recollected that this prize was wrested from the hands of Professor Taylor, of Gresham College, it having been discovered that his madrigal to which the prize had been awarded, contained something more than the "imitation of the ancient masters," and that in fact, several bars had been "begged, borrowed, or stolen," from Lucca Marenzio. The composition No. 11, "Wither away thou truant swain," was almost unanimously declared to be the best entitled to the prize; it was found to be the composition of Mr. Nethercliff.—Maestro.

MR. JOHN HULLAH is continuing his system of instruction in singing on the Wilhelm method, at the Apollonicon Rooms, with undiminished success.

BRIEF CHRONICLE.

The Grand Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine will be this year held at Cologne, on the first and second days of Pentecost. The orchestra of more than 2,000 performers, under Henri Don, first chapel-master of the Cathedral

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY produced an oratorio, "The Death of Abel," by Mr. Perry, the leader of their society, on the 17th The work was well received, but the room was far from full.

MR. MAINZER is still in Edinburg and is about to proceed to the Highlands for the formation of classes. The good folk of Scotland are in hopes to determine Mr. Mainzer to remain amongst them even should he not be a successful candidate for the Edinburg professorship of music

There is a new oratorio, "The Deliverance of Israel from Babylon," which is being published in monthly parts. The music is by an Englishman, Mr. William Jackson, of Masham This is a bold undertaking for a young musician, but judging from the works which he has formerly published, one which he will creditably complete.

At the ANCIENT CONCERTS during the last month, the following choral works have been produced.

THE HABITS OF PROFESSED MUSICIANS—Most men who have been remarkable for longevity have been fond of music. Professed musicians, with all their eccentricities and their constant residence in great cities, free living and late hours, will be found to have the advantage over persons of every other profession. It is an exhilarating recreation, that always furnishes company in solitude, relieves weariness, and dispels gloomy thoughts. Instances of suicide amongst musicians are comparatively very rare: although some have met with sad reverses, yet scarcely can an instance be found of cruelty remaining in the breast of a real musician—his soul is all harmony. I could never bring myself to encourage a father to chide his son for losing his time at a musical instrument. I like the simplicity of Lavater's maxim—"Keep at least three paces from him who hates bread, music, and the voice of a child."—Musical World.

Mr. George Cooper, organist of St. Sepulchre's, has been appointed "organist and singing master" at Christ's Hospital.

CHORAL FUND.—The annual concert of this institution took place on the 24th. We understand that fourteen widows, independently of orphans, are now receiving support from its funds; pensions are also granted to many of its infirm and afflicted members.

ROME.—They are about to erect a monument in that city to Palestrina, the regenerator of the religious music of the sixteenth century.

HAYDN AND SHERIDAN.—During the peace of Amiens, Sheridan and Haydn were rival aspirants to the honour of a seat in the National Institute of France. Haydn being the successful candidate, Sheridan publicly expressed his indignation at the choice the Institute had made. Haydn, when he heard how ill the orator bore his disappointment, sent him a letter of consolation, in which he begged him to consider that it was no wonder a German composer should have made a more acceptable overture than a British senator.—Maestro.

OXFORD FESTIVAL.—Great exertions are being made to render the approaching musical festival at Oxford, a most imposing and brilliant one. Sir H. R. Bishop has engaged many of the most eminent vocal and instrumental performers now in England. Handel's Messiah will, we believe, be the only complete sacred composition performed.

THALBERG has announced a morning concert, for Tuesday, May 28th, at the Hanover Square Rooms.

SABILLA NOVELLO gives an operatic performance and concert at the Princess's Theatre, on the 30th of May, in which she will be assisted by Sivori and a host of talent.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Creation was performed on the 31st instant; principal vocalists, Madame Caradori Allan. Hobbs, and Staudigl.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—Handel's Messiah will be performed for the benefit of this highly useful Society on Wednesday, June 5, by the eminent talent engaged at the Ancient Concerts.

DR. CALCOTT'S CELEBRATED TRIO.—Dr Callcott's well known trio to the beautiful words "Forgive, blest shade, the tributary tear," is said to have been composed while on a visit to the Isle of Wight. Certain it is that the words were taken from an epitaph on the tomb of Mrs. Berry, in Brading, in the same island, not far distant from St. John's, and may be seen in the churchyard to this day. The poet's name is entirely unknown. Dr. Callcott's music is admirably adapted to the words. He seems to have been sensibly alive to the pathos so happily expressed therein; and it is not too much to say, he hath conferred an immortality on the poet's verse by enshrining it in one of the emanations of his refined and creative genius.—Vide "Brettells' Hand-book to the Isle of Wight."

The Course of Instruction includes Two Weekly Lessons in a Principal Study; one in a Second Study, when deemed desirable by the Principal; one in Harmony; one in Elocution, for Singers; and the advantages of the Sight Singing Class, the Chamber Music Classes, and the Orchestral and Choral Practices. SCHIEDMAYER PIANOFORTES

TESTIMONIAL FROM MR. EDWARD LLOYD:—

London, August 17th, 1892.

Dear Mr. Ramsden,—The two Schiedmayer Pianofortes which I bought from you—a Grand and an Upright—manufactured by the "Schiedmayer Pianoforte fabrik, Stuttgart," are simply charming, and both give me the greatest satisfaction.

Beautifully sympathetic in tone, a touch that is most agreeable, and for evenness and repetition all that can be desired.

I may add that my musical friends who are Pianists and who have played upon these Pianos have expressed the same opinion. Yours faithfully,

EDWARD LLOYD.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'

PIANOFORTES

EMBODY THE PERFECTION OF TONE, TOUCH, AND DURABILITY.

THE DISTINGUISHING QUALITIES OF THESE PIANOS ARE—

1. Sympathetic Tone.
2. Flexibility and Lightness of Touch.
3. Great Sustaining Power of Tone.
4. Solidity.
5. Durability.
6. Facility and Permanency of Tuning.

1.—SYMPATHETIC TONE.—A writer truly says: "Words may appeal to the mind; melody may excite the imagination; but it is Tone which reaches the heart."

The tone of the Brinsmead Pianos is acknowledged by the whole of the profession and amateurs to be perfect, powerful, and sympathetic.

Madame ADELINA PATTI writes: "I am charmed with the tone and touch of the splendid pianoforte made for me by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons."

2.—FLEXIBILITY AND LIGHTNESS OF TOUCH.—The value of these cannot be exaggerated. Dr. Lardner has proved that the performance of Thalberg's fantasia on the prayer in "Mosè in Egitto" upon a piano of his day, with the common English action, gives an amount of labour which, if applied to lift a weight, would suffice to raise above eighty-four pounds a foot high. In the Brinsmead Pianos the touch and facility of repetition are absolutely perfect. Pianists are aware that rapid or modulating passages are impossible with ordinary pianofortes. Here the softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, even when the key is held down to within one-eighth of its depth.

GOUNOD writes: "These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists. The tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch of perfect evenness throughout."

3.—GREAT SUSTAINING POWER OF TONE.—The extreme value of these combinations to the vocalist, as well as to the pianist, is acknowledged by all the most celebrated members of the profession, and by innumerable amateurs. It is not only the singing quality which so effectually sustains the voice, but the volume of tone, which is increased or diminished with the most trifling effort of the accompanist; nor is the advantage less to the pianist, who may emulate the full orchestra or venture on delicate modulation or rapidity of repetition, without the fear of indistinctness or loss of fulness of tone.

LEONARD E. BACH writes: "Every pianist with a soul must feel himself carried away by the poetical gradations of sound given out by this piano. The sound-sustaining pedal enables the pianist to give effects which were formerly not considered possible."

4.—SOLIDITY.—The artistic and beautiful appearance of the finished pianoforte gives no idea of the solidity and strength of its structure, nor of the immense amount of capital for material alone absolutely necessary for the production of good pianos. As to the woods employed, the world is ransacked for the most adaptable English oaks, New Zealand pines, cedars from the Philippines, American poplar, and other woods, such as mahogany, spruce, black walnut, beech; these are some of the materials required, which, after five years' ripening residence in this country, are brought into the manufacture of the pianoforte. But no wood could withstand the tension of strings which, amounting to about twenty-two tons, is required by the present pianos, and the patented improvements of this firm rendered necessary iron frames, which look more suited to a steam engine than to form a part of one of the most delicate of instruments.

Mr. V. PORTMAN, Government Official of Port Blair, writes: "There can be no doubt that for India, and indeed all parts of the world where great heat and damp are combined, your pianos must be pre-eminent."

5.—DURABILITY.—Nothing can be more unsatisfactory than a pianoforte which will not "stand." Many pianos, brilliant at first, become twangy and grievously disappointing. The Brinsmead Piano, whether as a purchase or a gift, is ever valuable, because of its durability. Based on a skeleton of solid iron, on which all its component parts depend, there is really nothing to get out of order, while its woodwork is so solid, so well seasoned, and acclimatised, that no damp or heat in this or other countries will affect it irremediably.

The Rev. W. J. OLDFIELD, writing from Honduras, says: "We have just passed through the bulk of the wet season, which makes wood, leather, and clothing all mouldy, and rusts even carefully kept iron and steel; and your piano has, though in a position exposed to the damp sea air, passed through this ordeal without any appreciable alteration in tone or tune. The tone is the most perfect I have ever met with, everything is so solid and good throughout."

6.—FACILITY & PERMANENCY OF TUNING.—How seldom does one find an ordinary piano in tune; and how great is the disappointment of the hostess who has been depending on the performance of some clever amateur friend as she sees him raise his hands in horror from the inharmonious instrument. With such a tension as is now on the strings and with pegs let into unseasoned wood, it is impossible for a piano to remain in tune. In the country and abroad it is from this circumstance often advisable to leave the offending instrument severely alone. Messrs. Brinsmead have effectually overcome this difficulty. The wood is discarded, and the pegs rest in a solid iron frame. The system obviates all force in tuning, a turn of the nut tightening or loosening the string to the extent of one thread of the screw. These pianos defy the changes of climate, the tone pitch is sustained, and tuning is easy and infrequent.

Mr. V. PORTMAN, Government Official, writes: "At the Andamas there is a rainfall of 115 inches in the year, and a continual salt damp. This and the heat have hitherto proved fatal to pianos, and few people would buy them, as they would not stand a month in tune. Your instrument, with the patent tuning apparatus, has entirely revolutionised this idea."
